Yet theſe actions required ſome time, and wearied Antigonus his Adverſaries with painful Travail; after which, they remained only Savers. Antigonus himſelf at fair leiſure won all Caria the whileſt, and ſent Armies into Peloponneſus, and other parts of Greece, beſtowing Liberty upon all the Cities he took out of Caſſanders hands. The whole Country of Peloponneſus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Iſle of Eubœa, and many places of the firm Land were by theſe means won to be his in true and vehement Affection, ready to do or ſuffer any thing for him that had made ſo evident a demonſtration of his readineſs to give them the liberty indeed, which others promiſed in idle words. Many States deſirous of the ſame benefit, would fain have ſhewed their good Will; but they were kept in by Caſſanders Garriſons, who was too wiſe to truſt them looſe. Therefore Antigonus made ſhew as if he would paſs over into Macedon: by which terror he forced Caſſander to repair thither in all haſte, with the beſt of his ſtrength, leaving many good Towns of Greece ſo weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themſelves, if any forraign Succour appeared. The Aid which they deſired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Caſſanders Departure, entred the Country; drave his Garriſons out of divers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into League with their Lord; won the Cittadel of Thebes, and ſet the People at liberty. This laſt action was ſomewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raiſed out of her old Ruines by the meer Power of Caſſander; of which act he was accuſed by Antigonus, as if it had been ſome hainous Crime. Yet now the ſame Antigonus winneth the City, and the Love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaſer, than the Author of their Good; and rather to look forward upon thoſe Hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all meaſure, than backward upon their miſerable Nullity, that held them uncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great Battel at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus wan, against Demetrius the Son of Antigonus.

AS the preſence or nearneſs of Antigonus gave life to his Affairs in the lower Aſia, and Greece; ſo the deſigns of his Enemies, taking advantage of his abſence, ruined the very foundations of thoſe great Works in the Eaſtern parts, wherewith in the year preceding he had over-topped them. The Iſle of Cyprus, whoſe Princes wavered between contrary Affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their Covenant with Ptolomy, was viſited by an Ægyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own perſon, eaſily reduced them to a more ſetled order, putting ſome to death, carrying others away Priſoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Countrey. With the ſame Fleet he ran alongſt the Sea-coaſts, waſting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the ſpoyls of which he enriched his followers, and returned loaden to Cyprus. Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the Miſeries, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppreſſed, made all haſte out of Syria to the reſcue, taking only his Horſe and light-armed Foot with him, becauſe the buſineſs required expedition. But in vain did he tire himſelf and his followers, in haſty ſeeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep could in a few minutes delude the labour of ſo many days, if need had ſo required. Anſwerable to the vanity of this Expedition was the ſucceſs. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightened his Ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return upon thoſe maritime Countreys; or make toward Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Ægypt, and there with Seleucus was deſcribing a royal Army, which he levied with all convenient ſpeed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to chooſe out of uncertainties the moſt likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his Companies, which were fitter for ſervice in the open Field, than to be beſtowed in Garriſons among the Cilicians. He had ſcarce refreſhed his Men and Horſes in Syria, when the news arrived of Ptolomy's coming with a puiſſant Army, to give him Battel. Hereupon he called to counſel his principal Friends, who adviſed him to give way to the time, and expect ſome better opportunity in the future: being a young man, and weakly furniſhed with means to reſiſt ſuch ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomy and Seleucus. This counſel ſeemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of thoſe aged men that gave it, than from any neceſſity growing out of the preſent buſineſs. For Demetrius conſidering himſelf to be the Son of Antigonus, and now General of his Father's Army, thought his own title weighty enough to be laid in ballance againſt the bare Names of thoſe two great Commanders. Neither found he much reaſon that ſhould move him to diſtruſt his Forces, as inſufficient. His men were better exerciſed than the Enemies, and promiſed as much as could be required. Therefore perſwading himſelf, that ſuch odds of number, and of great fame, would rather ſerve to adorn his Victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he reſolved to put the matter to trial, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Souldiers with hope of ſpoyl and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpoſe to encounter them, as ſoon as they had finiſhed their weariſom Journey over the Deſarts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus iſſuing out of ſo rich a Province, as Ægypt, came ſo well provided of all Neceſſaries, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evil way, when Battel was preſented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things elſe they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deal with thoſe Beaſts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Paliſado, faſtened together with chains, and ſharpened in ſuch manner, that the Elephants could not ſeek to break upon it, without receiving much hurt. The reſt of their Forces, which (beſides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate Services, by them performed that year, whilſt the Enemies had wearied themſelves, either with vain Journeys, or long and dulling expectation, they diſpoſed in ſuch order, as beſt anſwered to the form, wherein Demetrius was embattelled. The Fight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part ſtriving more to win honour, than to ſatisfie any other paſſion, as having little cauſe of hatred, or revenge. But after ſome continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no neceſſity would needs fight a Battel with diſadvantage, began to appear by his loſſes. He had committed himſelf to Fortune, having more to loſe by her than he could get: but in this Fight ſhe was idle, and left all to be decided by ſtrong hands; unleſs it may be ſaid, that the terrour brought upon his men, by the loſs of his Elephants, was bad luck. Thoſe Beaſts were in that kind of War hardly to be reſiſted on plain ground, and therefore at the firſt they made great ſpoyl amongſt Ptolomy's men. Afterward ſeeking to break through the Paliſado, they were ſorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This diſaſter cauſed the Horſemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all muſt lye upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own Places good, they began to ſhrink, and many of them to provide for their ſafety by timely flight, which example the reſt quickly followed. When Demetrius had ſtroven ſo long in vain to make his men abide, that he himſelf was likely to be loſt; he was fain to give place to the ſtronger, making a violent retreat as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of Battel. A great part of his Carriages was in Gaza, whither ſome of his Company turned aſide, hoping to ſave ſuch Goods, as in haſte they could pack up. This fooliſh covetouſneſs was their deſtruction, and the loſs of the Town. For whilſt they, forgetful of the danger, had filled the Streets with ſumpter Horſes, and cloyed up the Gates, thronging, ſome to get in and fetch, others, to carry out what they had already loaden, Ptolomy's Army brake in without reſiſtance, taking them with their Goods and the City altogether.

This Victory reſtored unto Ptolomy the beſt part of Syria, a Province more eaſie in thoſe Times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatneſs of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no Place offered reſiſtance. In Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, ſome Towns held out a while, but were ſoon taken in by Ptolomy. Among theſe were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garriſon, falling to mutiny againſt their Captain; who truſting to the ſtrength of it, had made great vaunts, vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countreys in the higher Asia. The Æra of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with this Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomy followed his business with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his own fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length Master of the better part of Alexander's Purchases.

This Expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His Train consisted of no more than eight hundred Foot, and two hundred Horse, a number too small, to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needful, to make way into strong Places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the Walls. The Name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, wishing them, ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countreys, had the like affection; others made a countenance of War, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensigns. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so general, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily Enemies, in his own Lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the Field, and try the matter by Fight. But the Treason of one principal man, who revolted to the Enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seek to make good one strong Place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those Quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, Forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countreys about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all Enemies. Therefore when the Victory at Gaza, had opened unto Seleucus the way into those Parts, he found little impediment in the rest of his business. Having now gotten what he sought; it behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his own Forces were too small, and his Friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his Friends could not do for him, his Enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto himself, out of Persia and other Countreys, all needful help, came with ten thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this Power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large conquest of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his Enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the Place where his Resistance was expected, into certain Marishes not far off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain, he himself was driven to flee for his life into the Desarts; and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the Victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord, without any further stroke stricken.

This Victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new style, of The Kingdom of the Greeks, an accompt much used by the Jews, Chaldæans, Syrians, and other Nations in those Parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first year of this Æra. The Authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which, there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and two year of this accompt. Other Inference hereupon is needless, than that Note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the Sign of Virgo, as the Chaldæans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourscore and two year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These Observations of the celestial Bodies, are the surest marks of Time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks, were not reckoned in all Countreys from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accomps. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomy lost all that he had won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty Enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure, to go up to Babylon, with so few men as his Friend could then well spare: for had he stayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all, Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, having lost the Battel at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own Goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous meſſage, to this effect: That no perſonal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of Honour, wherein they would ſeek to right themſelves after ſuch manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, ſhould not be forgotten.

This noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius, an earneſt deſire of requiting him with ſome as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken Troops; drew as many as could be ſpared, out of the Garriſons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts; and advertiſing his Father of his misfortune, beſought him to ſend a new ſupply, wherewith he might redeem his Honour loſt. Antigonus, upon the firſt news of this overthrow, had ſaid, That the Victory, which Ptolomy wan upon a beardleſs Boy, ſhould be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon deſire that his Son, whom he tenderly loved, ſhould amend his own Reputation, he was content to make a ſtand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his Preparations, did nevertheleſs follow his own buſineſs in Cæloſyria; thinking it enough, to ſend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, againſt the remnant of thoſe, that had been already vanquiſhed, when their Forces were entire. This peradventure would have been ſufficient, had not Cilles too much undervalued the power of ſuch an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately ſaved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in ſetting further forward, than urgent reaſon ſhould provoke him. In this confidence he paſſed on without all fear; as one that were already Maſter of the Field, and ſhould meet with none, that would iſſue out of their places of ſtrength, to make reſiſtance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleſs March, he took the lighteſt of his Army, and made his Journey with ſuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the ſudden, without any Battel, Maſter of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their Carriages all at once.

This Exploit ſerved not only to repair the Credit of Demetrius, which his loſs at Gaza had almoſt ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the Bounty of Ptolomy, with equal Favour, in reſtoring to him Cilles, with many other of his Friends, accompanied with rich Preſents. But neither was Ptolomy ſo weakned by this loſs, nor Demetrius ſo emboldened by his Victory, that any matter of conſequence thereupon enſued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy; and therefore he fortified himſelf in Places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other ſide was loth to engage himſelf in an Enterprize, wherein he might perceive, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he ſhould either be driven to make a ſhameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole Eſtate, in hope of not much more than already he poſſeſſed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing ſlow in his way towards Syria; whither he made all haſte, not ſo much to relieve his Son, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had ſo well acquitted himſelf, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increaſe the reputation of this late Victory, he brought ſuch Forces, as might ſerve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, ſhould be referred unto the good foundation, laid by his Son; whom from this time forwards, he imployed in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomy had now leſs reaſon, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have aſſailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of Conſultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains adviſed him to retire into Ægypt; alledging many good Arguments, to that purpoſe: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that courſe; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſs againſt Perdiccas, in the like defenſive War. So he departed out of Syria, preſerving his Honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſudden paſſion of fear: and he departed at fair leiſure, not only carrying his Treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principal Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrey that he left at his back, fell preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe Times, for the Captain of a ſtrong Army, to make himſelf Lord of a great Province.

We may juſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the Victory of Alexander had over-run, with ſo haſty a courſe, as gave him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not only by himſelf, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot Contentions for ſuperiority between the King of Iſrael, and thoſe of Damaſcus between Ægypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nineve; the Perſians, and many Countreys; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in thoſe people; which are now ſo patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they ſuffer themſelves to be diſtributed, fought for, won, loſt, and again recovered, by contentious Maſters; as if they had no title to their own Heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more ſtrange, if we ſhall conſider, how the ſeveral States of Greece (many of which had never poſſeſſed ſo large Dominion, as might cauſe their Spirits to ſwell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occaſions of liberty: and how theſe proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, deſiring to have them rather Friends than Servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It muſt therefore be noted, that moſt of theſe Countreys, had always been ſubject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords; whom the Babylonians and Perſians long ſince had rooted out, and held them in ſuch bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of foreign Maſters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Perſian Empire: ſo that wanting within themſelves all ſoveraign power, or high authority (the life and ſpirit of every Eſtate) they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Perſian Satrapæ, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, ſtrive to lay hold upon thoſe Provinces, which had many Ages been ſubject unto them, and ſcarce four years in quiet poſſeſſion of their Enemies; or why at leaſt they contended not (when the terrible Name of that great Conqueror did ceaſe to affright them) to get their ſhares among his followers, if not wholly to diſpoſſeſs them of their new Purchaſes: it is a queſtion, wherein, who is not ſatisfied, may find no leſs reaſon to ſuſpect the Hiſtory, than Authority to confirm it. For we ſeldom read, that any ſmall Kingdom, prevailing againſt a far greater, hath made ſo entire a Conqueſt, in the compaſs of ten years, as left unto the vanquiſhed no hope of recovery, nor means to rebel; eſpecially when ſuch diſorders, or rather utter confuſion hath enſued, by the fury of Civil War among the Victors.

The cauſe why the Macedonians held ſo quietly the Perſian Empire, is well ſet down by Machiavel; and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are ſubject unto the like form of Government: the ſumm whereof is this. Whereſoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of ſlaves; there is the conqueſt eaſie, and ſoon aſſured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkiſh Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any Invader ſhould prevail ſo far upon Turky, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he uſeth not to ſuffer alive) were taken or ſlain: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and eaſily kept, without any danger of Rebellion. For the Baſſa's, how great ſoever they may ſeem, are meer ſlaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whoſe perſonal regard could get the people to follow him in ſuch an attempt, where in hope of private gain, ſhould not countervail all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwiſe, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a Conqueſt, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Countrey, and were by far the ſtrongeſt in the Field. For, beſides the Princes of the Royal Bloud, there are in that Kingdom ſtore of great men; who are mighty in their ſeveral Countreys, and having certain Royalties and Principalities of their own; are able to raiſe War, in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always ſtir up and inflame them, ſo that until every one piece were won, and every one (an endleſs work) of the chief Nobility, brought under or deſtroyed, the Victory were not compleat, nor well aſſured. It is true, that ſuch power of the Nobility, doth oftentimes make way for an Invader; to whom the diſcontentments of a few can eaſily make a fair entrance. But ſuch Aſſiſtants are not ſo eaſily kept, as they are gotten: for they look to be ſatisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they ſoon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unleſs they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to pleaſe one man, without offending another as good as himſelf. The Turk, on the other ſide, needs not to fear any peril, that might ariſe from the diſcontented ſpirits of his principal men. The greateſt miſchief that any of them could work againſt him, were the betraying of ſome frontier Town, or the wilful loſs of a Battel: which done, the Traitor hath ſpent his ſting, and muſt either flie to the Enemy, whereby he loſeth all that he formerly did hold, or elſe, in hope of doing ſome further harm, he muſt adventure to excuſe himſelf unto his Maſter, who ſeldom forgives the Captain, that hath not ſtriven by deſperate valour, againſt misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers againſt the great Sultan, and ſo joyning themſelves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than ſuch, as are ſubject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commiſſions. Now as this baſe condition of the principal men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppoſe themſelves againſt the flouriſhing eſtate of their Prince; ſo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him aſſiſtance, if adverſity ſhould make him ſtand in need of them. For there is ſcarce any one among the Turks Baſſa's, or Provincial Governours, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom deſcended, nor any one among them, that by the loſs and utter ruine of the Turkiſh Empire, can loſe any foot of his proper Inheritance, and it is the proper Inheritance of the Subject, which is alſo a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart againſt the Conquetor, who hath no other device painted on his Enſign, than the Picture of Slavery.

As is the Turkiſh Empire, ſo was the Perſian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly deſtitute of other Nobility, than ſuch as depended upon meer favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royal Bloud, and others, deſcended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, in oppreſſing the Magi: theſe were men of Reputation in Perſia; but their Reputation conſiſted only in their Pedigree, and their ſafety in not medling with affairs of State, which made them little eſteemed. In what ſmall account theſe Perſian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Uncles, Couſin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and ſo did ſtyle themſelves, in ſpeaking unto theſe great Monarchs. That upon every light occaſion of diſpleaſure they were handled as Slaves; it is eaſie to be diſcerned, in that example of Cruelty, practiſed by Xerxes upon his own Brother Maſiſtes, which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapæ, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needleſs to cite Examples, proving them to have been meer ſlaves: it may ſuffice, that their Heads were taken from them at the King's will; that is, at the will of thoſe Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Perſia, may be added the general want of Liberty convenient among the people: a matter no leſs available, in making eaſie and ſure the Conqueſt of a Nation, than is the cauſe aſſigned by Machiavel. For as Æſop his Aſs, did not care to run from the Enemies, becauſe it was not poſſible, that they ſhould load him with heavier burthens, than his Maſter cauſed him daily to bear: ſo the Nations, that endure the worſt under their own Princes, are not greatly fearful of a foreign yoke; nor will be haſty to ſhake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accuſtomed. This was it that made the Gaſcoigns bear ſuch faithful affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian Juriſdiction in Lumbardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of tyrannous Oppreſſors: and this did cauſe the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been ſubject unto the poſterity of Alexander's followers, to ſerve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eaſed of many burthens, which had been impoſed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameneſs, which we find in thoſe that had been Subjects of the Perſian Kings, the Reaſons are apparent. Yet ſome of theſe there were, that could not ſo eaſily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been abſolutely conquered by the Perſian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caſpian Sea. Such alſo were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: againſt whom Anti- gonus ſent part of his Army, thinking therewith to bring them under; or rather to get a rich booty. The Captain that he ſent fell upon the Nabathæans at ſuch time as they were buſied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrh, Frankinſence, and other ſuch Commodities. All, or moſt of theſe rich Wares, together with five hundred Talents of Silver, and many Priſoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was ſudden, and unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabathæans overtook them, and finding them weary with long marches, made ſuch a ſlaughter, that of four thouſand Foot, and ſix hundred Horſe, only fifty Horſe eſcaped. To revenge this loſs, Demetrius was ſent out with a greater power: yet all in vain; for he was not reſiſted by any Army, but by the natural defence of a vaſt Wilderneſs, lack of Water, and of all things Neceſſary. Therefore he was glad to make Peace with them, wherein he loſt not much Honour; for they craved it, and gave him Preſents. Returning from the Nabathæans, he viewed the Lake Aſphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raiſed, by gathering the Sulphur. With this good Husbandry of his Son, Antigonus was well pleaſed, and appointed men to the work; but they were ſlain by the Arabians, and ſo that hope vaniſhed.

Theſe petty enterpriſes, with the ill ſucceſs accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage againſt Ptolomy: when the news of Seleucus his Victories in the High Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loſs of thoſe great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected; neither was it ſafe to tranſport the War into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Aſia ſhould have been expoſed to the danger of ill affected Neighbours. A middle courſe was thought the beſt; and Demetrius, with fifteen thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, was ſent againſt Seleucus. Theſe Forces being ſent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his Son did leſs. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themſelves from neceſſity of fight; ſome places they fortified and kept; Dementius could hold nothing that he got, without ſetting in Garriſon more men than he could ſpare; neither did he get much, and therefore was fain to ſet out the bravery of his expedition by burning and ſpoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were, acknowledge to belong unto his Enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own aſſured.

Antigonus had laid upon his Son a peremptory commandment, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reaſonably thinking (as may ſeem) that in ſuch an unſettled ſtate of things, either the War might be ended, by the fury of the firſt brunt; or elſe it would be vain to ſtrive againſt all difficulties likely to ariſe, where want of Neceſſaries ſhould fruſtrate the Valour, that by length of time was like to become leſs terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore, leaving behind him five thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, rather to make ſhew of continuing the War, than to effect much, where himſelf, with greater Forces, could do little more than nothing, forſook the enterpriſe, and went back to his Father.

A general Peace made and broken. How all the Houſe of Alexander was deſtroyed.

THeſe ambitious heads, having thus wearied themſelves with uneffectual Travel, in ſeeking to get more than any one of them could hold, were contented at length to come to an agreement; wherein it was concluded, That each of them ſhould hold quietly, that which at the preſent he had in poſſeſſion. As no private hatred, but meer deſire of Empire had moved them to enter into the War, ſo was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulneſs growing upon the ſlow advancement of their ſeveral hopes, that made them willing to breath a while, till occaſion might better ſerve to fight again.

Beſides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every one held, there were two Articles of the Peace, that gave a fair, but a falſe colour to the buſineſs: That the Son of Alexander by Roxane, ſhould be made King, when he came to full Age; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers Kingdom, ſeems to have been a matter, forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcovered a purpoſe to make himſelf Lord of all. But this, indeed, more nearly touched Caſſander. For in his cuſtody was the young Prince and his Mother; neither did he keep them in ſort anſwerable to their degree, but as cloſe Priſoners, taken in that War, wherein they had ſeen the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that ſought to have put them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutual hatred and fear between them, rooted in theſe grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this concluſion of Peace, grew up faſter than any time before, in the heart of Caſſander, who ſaw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation towards the Son of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus, or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince muſt firſt have poſſeſſion of Macedon; whereby Caſſander ſhould be reduced to his poor Office, of Captain over a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Aridæus; or better, as being better acquainted with their own ſtrength. He in the mean time, by his readineſs to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himſelf from that ill-favoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelf Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of reſtoring the Greeks to their Liberty. This Liberty had hitherto been the ſubject of much idle diſcourſe; but it never took effect. Antigonus held ſcarce any Town of theirs; Caſſander occupied moſt of the Country: which if he ſhould ſet free, he muſt be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrel againſt him, as againſt a Diſturber of the common Peace.

In the mean ſeaſon, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek Seas, together with a great Army, and Money enough to entertain a greater, might ſerve to hold up the Credit of Antigonus, and to raiſe his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much diſadvantage do many men contend againſt one that is equal to them in all puiſſance, Caſſander's Friends had left him in an ill caſe; but he could not do with all: for where every one mans

mans help is necessary to the War, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections, which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects unto any man; much less to the Son of an Asiatique Woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slain: freeing thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yielding up his Government, which he must have done when the Child had come to Age. Roxane was a Lady of singular Beauty, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to have her Son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, she had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloudy malice, upon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custom of those Countries, wherein plurality of Wives is held no crime. For having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexander's name, gotten this poor Lady into her hands, she did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with Earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her Son made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time, as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisom imprisonment, grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander, was not so much detested in outward shew, as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their Estates, than such as might arise by chance of War; wherein every one perswaded himself of success, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rouse themselves; as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont, while their Master was careful in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the Liberty of Greece; yet did the same Argument minister unto Ptolomy matter of Quarrel, against both him and Cassander. Ptolomy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormity, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he wan four Towns, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his own or his Enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the Coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that Voyage allured unto him a Nephew of Antigonus, (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requital of his Services) whom finding shortly, as false to himself, as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at liberty, appeared not so plain, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an Expedition into Greece it self; where having set free some little Islands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired work, that Cratesipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polysperchon's Son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Cicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomy had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise up in Arms, whereby, with little labour, their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long servitude had well-near extinguished the ancient Valour of that Nation: and their ill Fortune, in many likely attempts to recover Freedom, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursuit thereof; but sat idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedæmonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Town with Walls; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a Wall to their Town and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble Servants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters; erecting as many Statues in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were days in their year. This Demetrius was now their Governour, and he governed them with much moderation; but in spight of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principal Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomy could not get them to set their helping hands to their own good; and to furnish him with the promised supplies, of Money and Victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldom; as judging the Commodity that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the loss that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the business, he changed his purpose; and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomy into Greece, Cassander had been held occupied with very much work. For (besides his pains taken in Wars among barbarous Princes) he found means to allure unto himself the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont; making his own advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilful practice, he freed himself from a greater danger; and made those Murders which he had committed seem the less odious, by teaching his Enemies to do the like. Old Polysperchon, that had made so great a stir in the Reign of Aridæus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter again upon the Stage, leading in his hand another Son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus, a Persian; but had been less esteemed than the Son of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time, the death of his Brother, had moved such compassion, and regard of his being Alexander's only living Child, had procured unto him such good will, that the demand which Polysperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very just and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyned with this young Prince; yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him, that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Army to withstand his entry into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Army, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assayed Polysperchon himself with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villain was contented to murder his Pupil, choosing rather with many curses, and fowl dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Army, than to purchase a Noble Fame with dangerous Travel, in maintaining his Faith unto both his dead and living Soveraigns.

Antigonus had not all this while been asleep, though his losses were hitherto the chief witnesses of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retain his own; and therefore took order for the recovery of those places, which Ptolomy had taken pains to win. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Cassander incur the general hatred of men, by committing those Murders, of which the profit was like to redound unto him, that was the most powerful: or to see Polysperchon and Ptolomy sweat in a busie War against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his Armies and Treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughty conceipts, he demeaned himself among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great loss to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune, whereon their own should have depended. Against this envy of his own men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to give him a goodly Title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes, whom he had a great desire to take to Wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever she discovered much willingness thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means; either because his fancy, being an old man, was not over violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander, King of Epirus, after whose death, she came to her Brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to find a new Husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following, so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her Marriage: nor did her Brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an Husband. She therefore, being a lusty Widow, suffered her Bloud so far to prevail against her Honour, that she supplied the want of an Husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest; saying, that she was his Sister, and must be allowed this liberty, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay, in a manner, void, and the Portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been; then did many seek to obtain her, while she her self desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she invite Leonatus unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest woers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had Wives already; Ptolomy had many Wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his Wives, being noted of too much dotage in that Kind. This hindred not his suit, peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her Journey from Sardes towards him, when Antigonus his Deputy in that City, made her to stay, until his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the Ears; he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her go. She would not be his Wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keep her Prisoner, had been the way, by which he might have incurred a general hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady less respected than Alexander's own Sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a Title to the Kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes, willing him in any case to do it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain Women about her put in trust with the Murder; which Women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his own opinion: but the World was less foolish, than to be so deluded. How the Murther was detected, we need not ask; for seldom is that bloudy crime unrevealed; and never so ill smothered, as when great Persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing less than the execution of Gods Justice, due unto the cruelty of these powerful, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent Bloud, were soon after cast down, over-whelming themselves or their Children with the Ruines, as the sequel will declare.

§. X.

How Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate Honours decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left alive, that had any Title to the Kingdom; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely profess themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgment of Antigonus, to crown his last action with such a Title, as if he had attained unto greatness by that foul Murder, the infamy whereof he was careful how to discharge from his own Head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such Honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of Royalty; whereof in seeming modesty, he was not covetous. To this purpose, he delivered a strong Army, with a Navy of two hundred and fifty Sail, and five thousand Talents Talents of Silver, unto Demetrius his Son; willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in ſetting all the Country free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected; ſo that without reſiſtance he entred the Haven, it being thought that a Fleet of Ptolomy, Caſſander's good Friend, had been arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cauſe of his coming, the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forſook the Town, and withdrew himſelf to Thebes, under ſafe conduct; only the Garriſon in Munychia ſtrove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the Siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garriſon of Caſſander, and ſo reſtored the City to liberty.

I think it not impertinent, ſometimes to relate ſuch accidents as may ſeem no better than meer trifles, for even by trifles, are the qualities of great Perſons as well diſcloſed, as by their great actions; becauſe in matters of importance, they commonly ſtrain themſelves to the obſervance of general commended Rules; in leſſer things they follow the current of their own Natures. The Lady Crateſipolis lay in Patræ, and had a great deſire to ſee Demetrius; hoping, belike, that ſhe might by his means better her Eſtate, and recover her Towns of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomy (to whoſe Lieutenant, in thoſe places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered Money for the ſurrender of them) yet the only buſineſs pretended was Love. He being advertiſed hereof, left his Forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a Company of his lighteſt armed, for guard of his Perſon, made a long journey to meet with her. This Troop alſo he cauſed to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might ſee her when ſhe came. As cloſely as the buſineſs was carried, ſome of his Enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any terms of reaſon, by taking his dear Son Priſoner. Their project fell but a little ſhort of the effect. For they came ſo ſuddainly upon him, that he had no better ſhift than to muffle himſelf in an old Cloak, and creep away diſguiſed, leaving them to ranſack his Tent. There was in this Prince a ſtrange medly of Conditions; eſpecially an extream diſſoluteneſs in wanton Pleaſures, and a painful induſtry in matter of War. He was of a moſt amiable Countenance, a gentle Nature, and a good Wit; excellent in deviſing Engines of War, and curious in working them with his own Hands. He knew better how to reform his bad Fortune, than how to rule his good. For Adverſity made his Valour more active, Proſperity ſtupified him with an over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he liſted. His Fortune was as changeable, as were his Qualities: turning often round, like the Picture of her Wheel, till ſhe had wound up the Thread of his Life, in ſuch manner as followeth to be ſhewed.

Returning to his Camp, and finiſhing his buſineſs at Megara; he reſolved, no longer to attend the iſſue of a Siege, to aſſail Munychia by force, that ſo he might accompliſh the Liberty of Athens; which, until it was fully wrought out, he refuſed to enter into the City. Munychia was ſtrongly fortified: yet by continuance of the Aſſault, the Multitude without, through help of their Engines that ſcoured the Walls, prevailed upon the reſolution of thoſe that lay within it, and wan the place in two days. The Walls and all the Defences of that Peece againſt the City, were levelled with the Ground; and ſo was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withal was given their Liberty, with promiſe to aid them in maintaining it.

The Fame of this Action was louder than of any other Victory gotten by Demetrius with greater Skill and Induſtry. For the Athenians having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their Tongues: converting to baſe Flattery that Eloquence of theirs, which the Virtues of their Anceſtors had ſuited unto more manly Arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius, the Name of Kings; they conſecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their City, and built there an Altar, calling it by the Name of Demetrius the Alighter; they called them by the Names of the Gods their Saviours, ordaining that every year there ſhould be choſen a Prieſt of theſe Gods; and further, that ſuch as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of theſe two Princes, ſhould not be called Embaſſadors, but Theori, or Conſulters with the Gods; like as were they, whom they ſent unto the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearſe all their Flatteries, theſe being ſo groſs. Hereby they not only corrupted the young Prince, but made that Acclamation, which beſt would have pleaſed the old man, to be of no uſe. For he could not handſomly take upon him the Name of King, as impoſed by the Athenians, unleſs he would ſeem to approve their Vanity, in loading him with more than humane Honours. Yet was he ſo tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Conſulters came ſhortly after, deſiring him to relieve them with Corn, and Timber to build Ships, he gave them almoſt a hundred thouſand quarters of Wheat, and matter ſufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his firſt Oracle, or rather, ſo weak is great Power in reſiſting the Aſſaults of Flattery.

§. XI.

The great Victory of Demetrius againſt Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the Stile of Kings; wherein others followed their Example.

FRom this glorious Work, Antigonus called away Demetrius unto a buſineſs of greater difficulty: meaning to imploy his ſervice againſt Ptolomy in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to eſtabliſh a general Council, that ſhould treat of matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the ſame time Antigonus withdrew his own Garriſon out of Imbros, committing their Liberty entire into the Peoples hands: whereby it might appear, That as he would not permit any other to oppreſs the Greeks, ſo would he be far from doing it himſelf. This was enough to hold his Reputation high among theſe new purchaſed Friends: it followed, that he ſhould convert his Forces to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitiful Tragedy had lately happned in Cyprus, through the indiſcretion of Menelaus, Ptolomy's Brother, and his Lieutenant in that Iſle. Nicocles, King of Paphos, was entred into ſome practice with Antigonus: yet not ſo far that he thought himhimſelf paſt excuſe; by which confidence, he was perhaps, the more eaſily detected. To cut off this Negotiation and the falſe-hearted King of Paphos at one Blow, Menelaus was ſent thither, who ſurrounding Nicocles his Houſe with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies Name, to have him yielded to the Death. Nicocles offered to clear himſelf; but Menelaus told him, that die he muſt, and bid him come forth quietly. This deſperate neceſſity cauſed the unhappy King to rid himſelf of Life: and his Death ſtruck ſuch an impreſſion into his Wife, that ſhe not only ſlew her ſelf, but perſwaded the Wives of her Husbands Brethren to do the like. Alſo thoſe Brethren of Nicocles, unto whom Ptolomy had intended no ill, being amazed with the ſuddenneſs of this Calamity, did ſhut up the Palace, and ſetting it on fire, conſumed it, with all that was in it, and themſelves together.

Whatſoever the Crime objected was, Nicocles periſhed as a man innocent, becauſe he was not ſuffered to make his Anſwer. Of this ſad Accident, though Menelaus deſerved the Blame for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought that much diſlike fell alſo upon Ptolomy: as men that are grieved, caſt an ill affection, even upon thoſe that gave the fartheſt removed occaſion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a Power ſufficient againſt any Oppoſition that Ptolomy was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing againſt him: either becauſe they had ſmall ſtrength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being ſure that they ſhould not themſelves have the Rule of their own Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garriſons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to ſave himſelf within the Walls of Salamis; where he was ſo hardly beſieged, that without ſtrong Succour, he had no likelihood to make good the Place, much leſs to retain Poſſeſſion of the whole Iſland. His greateſt help at the preſent, was the Fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no Rewards could win from him, nor good Uſage (when any of them were taken Priſoners, and inrolled in the Enemies Bands) keep from returning to him, with the firſt opportunity. Moſt of them were Mercenaries; but all their Goods were in Ægypt, which was enough to keep them faithful. Yet could not this their Reſolution have ſtood long againſt the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as reſolute, and againſt his terrible Engines of Battery, if Ptolomy had not haſted to the Reſcue.

Ptolomy brought with him a hundred and forty Gallies, beſides two hundred Ships of burden, for tranſporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible ſhew, when it was deſcried afar; though more than half of it, was unfit for ſervice in Fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the Opinion of his Forces the more dreadful, Ptolomy ſent unto Demetrius a threatning Meſſage, willing him to be gone, unleſs he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a Throng. But this young Gallant repaied him with Words of as much bravery, promiſing to let him eſcape, upon condition that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of Sicyon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteen Gallies; but they were for the moſt part, greater than thoſe of Ptolomy; better ſtored with Weapons fit for that Service; and very well furniſhed with Engines in the Prowes to beat upon the Enemy. Nevertheleſs he ſtood in great doubt of threeſcore Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, leſt Menelaus with them ſhould ſet upon his Back: in which caſe, it was likely that all ſhould go very ill with him. Againſt this miſchief, he beſtowed ten of his own Gallies in the Mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from iſſuing forth, and ſetting his Horſe-men on the Shore, to give what aſſiſtance they could, he, with the reſt of his Fleet, puts to Sea againſt Ptolomy.

The Fight began early in the morning, and continued long with doubtful ſucceſs. The Generals were not ranged oppoſite one to the other; but held each of them the left Wing of his own Fleet. Each of them prevailed againſt the Squadron wherewith he encountred; but the ſucceſs of Demetrius was to better purpoſe. For his Victory in one part was ſuch as cauſed others to fall out of order, and finally drave all to betake themſelves unto ſpeedy flight. As for Ptolomy, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the Enemy in one part of the Fight, that he might relieve and animate thoſe of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his Loſs over great, to be repaired, by contending any longer againſt the Fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to ſave himſelf, in hope of better event, that might follow ſome other time.

There fell out in this Battel no unuſual accident; yet was the Victory greater than could have been expected. The occaſions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-ſervices, which the Greeks and Phœnitians, that were with Demetrius, had, above thoſe which followed Ptolomy: partly the good Furniture of the Ships, wherein conſiſted no leſs, than in the Quality of thoſe with whom they were manned. Further, we may reaſonably judge, that the two hundred Ships of Burthen, carrying the ſtrength of Ptolomies Army, did not more encourage his own men and terrifie his Enemies the day before the Fight; than breed in each part the contrary Affections, when in the beginning of the Fight, they fell off, and ſtood aloof. For though it were fitting that they ſhould ſo do, yet a Multitude prepoſſeſſed with vain Conceits, will commonly apprehend very ſlight occaſions, to think themſelves abandoned. Beſides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus iſſuing with his Fleet out of Salamis, ſhould charge the Enemies in Stern, was utterly fruſtrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten Ships appointed to bear up the Mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as great neceſſity required.

Such diſappointment of expectation, doth much abate the Courage of Men in Fight; eſpecially of the Aſſailants: whereas on the contrary, they that find ſome part of their Fears vain, do eaſily gather hopeful Spirits, and conceive an Opinion of their own Ability, to do more than they had thought upon, out of their not ſuffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatſoever the cauſes of this Victory were, the Fruit was very great. For Ptolomy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the reſt of his Fleet was either taken or ſunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer ſtrive againſt the violence of Fortune; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Army, conſiſting of twelve thouſand Foot, and a thouſand and two hundred Horſe, and thoſe Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The ſame dejection of Spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had ſerved the Ægyptian by Land: none of them repoſing any more confidence in Ptolomy, but willingly becoming

ing Followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this Fight, than the Isle of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with Cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the Issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a notable Flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good News. Aristodemus had bethought himself of a Trick, whereby to double the Welcome of his joyful Errand: he caused his Ships to ride at Anchor a good distance from the Shore; he himself landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the Ship, and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his Tidings might appear in his Countenance. Report of his Arrival (for it was known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any Answer, nor so much of a Look, as might intimate the purport of his Errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he fair and softly forward, with a great Throng at his Heels (that served well to set out his Pageant) until he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not contain himself, but went down to meet him at the Gate, and hear the News. Then did Aristodemus, upon the suddain, with a high Voice, salute Antigonus by the Name of King; uttering the greatness of the Victory (with as much Pomp as before he had covered it with Silence) in the hearing of all the People; who with loud Acclamations, gave that Name of King both to Antigonus and to his Son Demetrius. Antigonus, in requital of the long Suspence, wherein Aristodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere he received his Reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diadem, which his Friends did set on his Head, he could not wish a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his Son.

When it was once noised abroad that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their Fellows were ready to follow the good Example. Ptolomy his Friends would by no means endure that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the loss of a Fleet; therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace, had boldness enough to put the Diadem about his own Head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous People, taken upon him as King; but now he used the stile indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himself contented with his own Name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his Pride, he no way lessened the Fame of his Cruelty against his Masters House. But the Name which he forbore, his Sons after him, were bold to usurp, though with ill success, as will appear, when they shall enter upon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, under new Habits, as no longer now the same Persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger Looks, and more boistrous Actions, not with greater Grace and Judgment than in the Scenes already past.

Chap. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others, until all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Ægypt, with ill success.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that Name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himself, as beseeming his Greatness; which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new Titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomy, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an Army of eighteen thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a Fleet of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred Ships of Burden. The Land-forces he commanded in Person: of the Navy, Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the Journey, the Seamen advised him to stay yet eight days longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hasty desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomy should make, rejected this Counsel, imputing it rather to their Fear than Skill. Wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his own Name, that was soon changed into Seleucia, by his mortal Enemy) and came to Gaza; where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Ægypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celerity to prevail more than by his great Power. He caused his Souldiers to carry ten days Provision of Victuals, and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Deserts, over which he marched with no small toil, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cassius, which is near adjoyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the Shore, in ill caſe, and many Ships wanting. It had been ſorely beaten with foul weather, wherein ſome were loſt, others driven back to Gaza, or ſcattered elſewhere into ſuch Creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himſelf, with the beſt and ſtrongeſt Veſſels, did ſo long beat it up againſt the Wind, that all his freſh Water was ſpent; in which extremity, he and all his muſt have periſhed, had not the Tempeſt ceaſed when it did, and Antigonus appeared in ſight, from whom theſe over-wearied, thirſty, and Sea-beaten Souldiers received relief; after theſe painful Travels there followed a War, no leſs painful than to little purpoſe, for Ptolomy had ſo fortified all the Paſſages upon the River of Nilus, as he aſſured himſelf either to end the War there, or if his Guards ſhould happen to be forc'd, yet could it not be done, but ſo much to the weakning of the Aſſailants, as he ſhould afterward, with a ſecond Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus ſought, was to come to Blows ſpeedily, Ptolomy on the contrary to beat Antigonus by the Belly. It is true that Nilus gave him Water enough, but Wood he had none to warm it, and while Antigonus aſſaulted the Rampiers raiſed upon the River in vain, Ptolomy aſſaied the Faith of his Souldiers with good ſucceſs, for with great Gifts, and greater Promiſes, he ferried them over ſo faſt, as had not Antigonus thruſt ſome aſſured Regiments upon the Paſſages next the Enemy, and in the mean while taken a reſolution to return, Ptolomy had turned him out of Ægypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their eſcape, and thoſe he put to death with extream Torments, but in all likelihood with the ſame ill ſucceſs that Perdiccas had formerly done when he invaded Ægypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off from the noiſe of their Entertainment that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore, as well the preſent danger of his ſtay, as the ſhame following a forc'd Retreat, he ſecretly practiſed the advice of his Councel, upon whom the burden muſt be laid of his entrance, and leaving Ægypt.

It is indeed leſs prejudicial in ſuch like caſes, that Errors, Diſhonours, and Loſſes, be laid on Counſellors and Captains, than on Kings, on the Directed than on the Director, for the Honour and Reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vaſſal; Charles the Fifth, as many other Princes have done, laid the Loſs and Diſhonour he received in the Invaſion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antonie de Leua, whether juſtly or no, I know not; but howſoever all the Hiſtorians of that time agree, that the Sorrow thereof coſt that brave Captain his Life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtful Enterpriſes, is rather a Teſtimony of Love, than of Wiſdom in the giver; for the ill ſucceſs is always caſt upon the Councel, the good never wants a Father, though a falſe one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have ſometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the preſent in place of Kings, have not only been diſſwaded, but held in a kind by ſtrong hand, from hazarding their own Perſons, and yet have thoſe kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marſhalls Court.

§. II.

How the City of Rhodes was beſieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus left behind it many dead Carcaſſes, and a great deal of Joy in Ægypt. Ptolomy held a ſolemn Feaſt, and ſent Meſſengers abroad, loaden with glad News, to Seleucus, Lyſimachus, and Caſſander, his Confederates: ſtrongly incouraging all that ſide with the report of this his late Felicity, though it appeared but in a defenſive War. Antigonus on the contrary flattered himſelf with another interpretation, calling the Joys of his Enemies for Witneſſes of his own Greatneſs, ſeeing they aroſe but from ſo little things: his Enemies being but bare Savers by the laſt Bargain, and himſelf, as he ſuppoſed, having loſt but a little time, and no part of his Honour in the late Retreat. Howſoever it were, yet he meant to follow his Affairs henceforth in another faſhion, for that which he could not cleave aſunder by great blows, he purpoſed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the Branches firſt, to fell the Tree it ſelf with the more facility. To effect which he reſolved (leaving the great ones to grow a while) to root up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates ſhould be forc'd, either to relieve, or to loſe; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the Field, where the advantage of Power, and of all other Warlike Proviſions, promiſed him Victory.

At this time the City of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it ſelf in good Neutrality, it drew the better part of all the Trade of thoſe parts, and thereby a great deal of Riches to it ſelf, to maintain which, and to increaſe it, it furniſhed and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which, it not only beat off all Pirats and petty Thieves, but the Reputation of their Strength was thereby ſo much increaſed, as all the Neighbour Princes ſought their Alliance and Confederacy.

In this ſo dangerous a time (in which they muſt either refuſe all that ſought them, and ſo ſtand friendleſs and apart, or joyn themſelves to ſome one; and thereby forgoe the Peace, by which their Greatneſs had grown) their Affections carried them to the Ægyptian, both becauſe the greateſt part of their Trade lay that way, as alſo for that Antigonus his Diſpoſition, Greatneſs, and Neighbourhood was fearful unto them. This Affection of theirs, with ſome other Paſſages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himſelf againſt them by petty Injuries, of taking ſome of their Ships, with ſuch other Grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation to purſue the War againſt them openly and ſtrongly. All things ſoon after ordered according to the greatneſs of the Enterpriſe, he imployed his Son Demetrius againſt them in their own Iſland, who brought ſuch terrour upon the Citizens, that laying aſide all reſpect of Friendſhip and Honour, they offered him their aſſiſtance and ſervice againſt whomſoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this Charge came, and that the alteration was perſwaded by fear, and not by Love, raiſed his Demands to an intolerable height, requiring an hundred Hoſtages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many Ships of War as himſelf pleaſed: theſe Conditions, more properly to be impoſed upon a State already conquered, than on thoſe who as yet had heard of nothing but a conſtrained aſſiſtance, assistance, restored unto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolve to defend their Liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able Bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow Citizens, than to make themselves fellow Slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the fair conditions offered, and the Rhodians the fearful ones propounded them, makes preparation for a long Siege, and finding no appearance to carry the Place in fury, he set in hand with his Engines of Battery; in the invention and use of which, he never shewed himself a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the Assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave Sallies out of the Town, and the Famine which they indured within the Town, which had proved far more extreme, if Ptolomy had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Græcian Embassadors, gave over the Siege; a hundred Hostages they gave him for performance of the Peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the City.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the usual Policy of War and State: for while, with the Flower of all his Fathers Forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by Practise and Surprise, but by a strong and well compounded Army, which he himself led as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and indangered Athens it self. On the other side (though with less success) did Polysperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the Enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great Honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Island, than that the Rhodians erected Statues in Honour of Lysimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawful to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gave the same fair answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, so was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the Soil: and yet was this a far more cleanly Creation than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius by Decree of the People. A mad Age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captains could not content themselves with the Stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called Gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece, Cassander desires Peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great Preparations of War against Antigonus.

Demetrius coming with a strong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly drave Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his Fortune, chased him beyond the Straits of Thermopylæ. Herein his Reputation did much avail him, which was so great, that six thousand of his Enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So partly by the greatness of his Name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those Straights, and giving liberty unto the People, he bestowed upon the Athenians those Peeces which had been fortified against them, to block them up. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more easie success: for he suddainly took Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old Seat into an other place: and called it after his own Name Demetrius. This done, he betook himself to his Pleasure: At the Isthmian Games he caused himself to be proclaimed Captain General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of Jest, that any, save himself or his Father, should usurp the Name of King. But in his Behaviour, he was so far unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserved none other Name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to devise new Honours for him; among which they made one Decree, that whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the Gods, and just with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great fear, lest the Wars should fall heavily upon him in Macedon, which to avoid, he knew no better way than to make Peace with his Enemy betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadors, but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole Estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in soliciting his Friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common Danger, for Lysimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt Forces they should all together set upon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice, but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a Flock of Birds are driven away with a Stone. With these conceipts he pleased himself, and no way hindred the proceeding of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Town of Antigonia (a Name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately Game and Pageants, in ostentation of his Glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous News of Lysimachus his Victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his Forces, wherewith to pass over into Asia, while himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, began to make hot War upon the Subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts to joyn with him by fair means; winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldness, Antigonus made hasty Journeys, and came soon enough to recover his Losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compel him to come to Battel.

Lyſimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himſelf the whilſt from neceſſity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his Preparations were too great to be ſoon in a readineſs. The Winter alſo did hinder his Journey: which inforced them on both ſides to reſt in ſome quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the Quarrel in open Field, held all thoſe Nations in a great ſuſpence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been ſo froward, that he refuſed to yield unto any peaceable Conditions. At length Seleucus drew near with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered ſtrength in that long time of leiſure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great Aid from Ptolomy, that was joyned with his Forces.

To help in this needful caſe, Demetrius was called over into Aſia by his Fathers Letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made Peace with Caſſander, upon reaſonable terms: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Countrey; and that his Journey might be without any ſuch blemiſh of Reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the Peace was, That all the Cities of Greece ſhould be at liberty. Caſſander was glad to be ſo rid of an Enemy, that was too ſtrong for him. Yet would this League have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwiſe than they did in Aſia; ſeeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It ſufficed, that for the preſent, every one found means to clear himſelf of all Incumbrances elſewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himſelf to the tryal of the main Controverſie in Aſia.

§. IV.

How Antigonus was ſlain in a great Battel at Ipſus, near unto Epheſus; wherein his whole Eſtate was loſt.

SEleucus, with his Son Antiochus, joyning with Lyſimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all conſidered) not inferior to that of the Enemy. In greatneſs of Name (that helpeth much in all Wars, but eſpecially in the Civil) they were rather unanſwerable, than equal to their Adverſaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a maſtering ſpirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the reſt were held but Uſurpers of the Title. Likewiſe Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great Services of all kinds, and enriched the Art of War with many inventions, which even his Enemies, and particularly Lyſimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had ſometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully ſtollen away from him to ſave his life; with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this Journey; and Lyſimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wild Thracians; wanted much in Reputation, of that which was yielded to their oppoſites: yet ſo, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough, to receive any benefit that Fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both ſides, were for the moſt part hardy and well exerciſed: many of them having ſerved under Alexander; though of thoſe old Companies, the long ſpace of two and twenty years had conſumed the greateſt number. But concerning their Affections; the Followers of Seleucus were eaſily perſwaded, that in this Battel they muſt either get the upper hand, or put in extream danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could diſcern no other neceſſity of fighting, than the obſtinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Maſter of all. Antigonus had about threeſcore and ten thouſand Foot, ten thouſand Horſe, and threeſcore and fifteen Elephants. His Enemies were ſix thouſand ſhort of him in number of their Foot; in Horſe they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and a hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War; which Helps, though they little had availed the Perſians, yet were they not to be deſpiſed, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himſelf, either troubled with the unexpected greatneſs of his Enemies Forces, or preſaging little good like to enſue, grew very penſive, communing much in private with his Son, whom he commended to the Army as his Succeſſor: whereas in former times he had never been ſo jocund, as towards the hour of Battel, nor had been accuſtomed to make his Son, or any other, privy to his counſel, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the Fight, or afterwards deviſed, I hold it needleſs to recount: Diana of Epheſus dwelt near to the place of Battel, a buſie Goddeſs in many great Fights, and therefore likely to have been thruſt into the Fable, if any matter, nearly reſembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is eaſie to believe that theſe two ſo gallant Armies, containing well near all the ſtrength of Alexander's whole Empire, performed a notable Fight, being led by ſuch worthy Commanders and whom the iſſue thereof did highly concern. Yet are few of the Particulars recorded: an eaſie loſs in regard of the much variety, wherewith every Story aboundeth in this kind. The moſt memorable things in the Battel, were theſe. Demetrius with his beſt force of Horſe, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was ſo tranſported with the heat of his good ſucceſs, that he never gave over his purſuit, but left his Father naked, and loſt thereby both him, and the Victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he interpoſed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many Troops of Horſe offering to break upon the Enemies Battel, whereſoever it lay moſt open, he did ſo terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather choſe to revolt from their Lord, whilſt they were fairly invited, than to ſuſtain the fury of ſo dangerous an impreſſion. This Cowardize, or rather Treaſon of ſome, diſcouraged others; and finally, caſt them all into flight; expoſing their General to the laſt end of his Deſtinies. Antigonus was then fourſcore years old, very fat and unweildy, ſo that he was unapt for flight, if his high ſpirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him ſome of his moſt truſty Followers, and as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great Troop making towards his Perſon, told him, Sir King, yonder Company means to charge you; he anſwered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve us. Thus expecting, to the very laſt, that his Son ſhould come to the reſcue, he received ſo many Darts into his Body, as took away his lately ambitious, but then fearful Hopes, together with his troubleſom Life.

His

His great ability in matter of Arms, together with his insatiable desire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his Actions. He was more feared by his Enemies, than loved by his Friends; as one that could not moderate his Fortune, but used Insolence towards all alike, as if it had been some Vertue neareſt representing a Kingly Majesty. This was the cause that so many of his Followers revolted to his Enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forsook him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the careful endeavours of their Vassals, only Duty and Debt; and are more apt to punish the least Offences, than to reward the greatest Services: shall find themselves upon the first change of Fortune, (seeing it is Love only that stays by Adversity) not only the most friendless, but even the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his Son.

§. V.

How Demetrius forsaken by the Athenians after his Overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new Fortune, and shortly entring into new Quarrels.

FOr Demetrius, at his return, from the idle pursuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to save himself, with four thousand Horse, and five thousand Foot, by a speedy retreat unto Epheſus, whence he made great haste towards Athens, as to the Place, that for his sake would suffer any Extremity. But whilst he was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Ambassadors met him with a Decree of the People, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their City. These were Ambassadors, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shameless Ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, with such a Decree: neither did any part of his Calamity more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to see his Adversity despised by those whom he had thought his surest Friends. Yet was he fain to give good words. For he had left many of his Ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great need, and therefore was fain to speak them fair, that sometimes had grosly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old Language, and speak unto them in another Tune. When he had gotten his Ships, he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his Enemies Pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or means, wherewith to sustain him and his Followers, any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part, of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and those few Places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve. For to put himself into the Field, on the side of Asia, he had no power; and to incloſe himself in any Town, how strong soever, were but to imprison his Fortune, and his Hopes, or therein indeed to bury himself and his Estate. He therefore creeping thorow those Bushes, that had fewest Briars, fell upon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the spoyl, that was gotten, to his Souldiers: his own losses having been too great, to be repayed again by small Prizes.

In the mean while, the Confederate Princes had wherewithal to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late Victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage, by being present and Master of the Field. For neither Ptolomy, nor Cassander, were at the Overthrow given, having only sent certain Troops to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led: who took hold of a part of Asia the less, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his own Territory than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that War, which they made only in their own common defence. It was therefore lawful for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the Victory: at which, nevertheless others did repine, and though they neither could, nor durst, accuse him of ill dealing, for the present, yet seeing the overgreatness of Seleucus brought no less danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same Reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined: for he read it in the Law universal of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget Friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable Passion: the hatred of each to other, and their Loves being laid on the one side, against their Profits on the other were found so far too light, as Seleucus who had to day slain Antigonus the Father, and driven Demetrius the Son out of Asia, sought to morrow, how to match himself with Stratonica, Demetrius his Daughter, and so by Demetrius to serve his turn against Lysimachus.

The Story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the Son of Seleucus, fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Seleucus his Father, to save his Sons life, gave her (though she were his Wife) unto him, and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this Alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolomy and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought one of them again into the rank of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the Marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter Times: namely between the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder Times been found more faithful, than those of the same later Times have been; as in the Stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperor, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may observe: between whom from the year of our Lord, One thousand, four hundred, ninety and five, when Charles the eighth undertook the Conquest of Naples, to the year, One thousand, five hundred, fifty and eight, when Henry the second died, the Histories of those Times tell us, that all the Bonds, either by the Bed or by the Book, either by Weddings, or Sacramental Oaths, had neither faithful purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit, by giving his Daughter to his Enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Cilicia from Pliſtarchus, the Brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonus his Possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper Forces, from him, that entred upon it as a lawful Heir: neither would Seleucus lend him any Help, as by the Rule of Confederacy he ſhould have done, againſt the common Enemy. So Pliſtarchus with very angry complaint, as well againſt Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Caſſander; whither Phila, their Siſter, followed him ſhortly, to pacifie them both, and keep all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her Husband, that was not ſtrong enough to deal with Caſſander, and therefore glad to make uſe of that bond of Alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own proſperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the ſame time he took to Wife a Daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wives being familiar with theſe Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eaſtern Conqueſts) and ſo was he by two Marriages, rather freed from two Enemies, than ſtrengthened with two Friends: for neither of them wiſhed him any good, otherwiſe than might ſerve to advance their own ambitious deſires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy, could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their Countenance, ſhould ſeek his Fortune ſomewhat farther off, than ſettle his Eſtate under their Noſes. Particularly Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelf: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo that Seleucus would fain have ſet his new Father-in-law upon the neck of Lyſimachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late Purchaſe of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thouſand Talents of his Fathers Treaſure, that would ſerve him to make ſport a while. This refuſal ſo diſpleaſed Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the City of Tyre and Sidon, to be ſurrendred unto him; which were the only Places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great Battel. Inſtead of giving them up, Demetrius took preſent order to have them better manned; and ſpake it ſtoutly, That were he overcome a thouſand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this Quarrel Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant diſpoſition, that would break Friendſhip with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire conſumed it ſelf in words, which had it faſtned upon arms, like it is that the weaker ſhould have found Friends, out of envy to the ſtronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius wan the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but loſt in Aſia. Of Troubles in Macedon following the death of Caſſander.

IN the mean while, the Athenians not knowing how to uſe the liberty, which Demetrius had beſtowed on them, were fallen by Sedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their diſtempered City was ſo weakned, that it ſeemed ill able to keep off the puniſhment due to their late Ingratitude. This advantage haſtned him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to preſent himſelf unto them, in the habit of a revenging Fury. He brought againſt them all the Force that he could well ſpare from other Employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, becauſe his doubtful Eaſtern Friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any Buſineſs that might entangle him in Greece. His firſt Enterprize in Athens had ill ſucceſs; a great part of his Fleet periſhing in a Tempeſt. But he ſoon repaired the loſs; and (after ſome Victories in Peloponneſus, where he wan divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the Enterprize, waſted the Countrey of Attica, and cut off all Relief from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it ſtood in a barren Soyl, and wanted now the command of thoſe Iſlands, and Places abroad, from whence it was wont to be ſtored with Victuals; being alſo deſtitute of means to keep ſuch a Navy, as might bring in ſupply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, againſt that of Demetrius. Yet was there ſome hope of Succour from Ptolomy, who (truſting thereby to win the Love of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fifty Ships with Corn, and ſent them to relieve the hungry City. But theſe hundred and fifty were unable to deal with three hundred good fighting Ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore haſted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come ſo near, that they might be deſcryed. This brake the heart of the People; among whom the Famine was ſo extream, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouſe, which dropped down between them from the Houſe top. Wherefore they ſent Ambaſſadors to yield up the Town, and crave pardon, having ſo far offended, that out of deſperation, they made it a capital offence, to propoſe any motion of Peace. Yet were they fain to aboliſh this Decree: rather becauſe they knew not what elſe to do, than becauſe they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the Victory, did not only forbear to take away the Lives of theſe unthankful men; which they had ſubmitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongſt them ſuch as were moſt acceptable to the People. Nevertheleſs he was grown wiſer than to truſt them ſo far as he had done in Times paſt. And therefore, when (among other flattering Acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a ſure Garriſon within their Walls, to keep them honeſt perforce. After this he went into Peloponneſus, vanquiſhed the Lacedæmonians in two Battels, and was in very fair poſſibility to take their City: when the dangerous news called him in all haſte, of Lyſimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faſter upon him elſewhere, than himſelf did upon his Enemies in Greece. Lyſimachus had won many Towns in Aſia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Iſle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were ſtraightly beſieged. Whilſt he was bethinking himſelf which way to turn his Forces, a notable piece of buſineſs offered it ſelf, which thruſt all other Cares out of his Head.

Caſſander was lately dead in Macedon, and ſoon after him, Philip his eldeſt Son, whoſe two younger Brethren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdom. In this Quarrel, Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caſſander had married, ſeemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder Son: who thereupon grew ſo enraged, that moſt barbarouſly he ſlew his own Mother. The odiouſneſs of this Fact gave a fair luſtre to Alexander's Cauſe: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked Parricide Antipater. But Antipater was ſo ſtrongly backed by Lyſimachus, whoſe Daughter he had married, that Alexander could not hope to make his Party good without ſome foreign aid. For which cauſe he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will ſoon appear, in the following Tragedy, of him and his Brother. Their Father Caſſander had been one that ſhifted well for himſelf, at ſuch time as every man ſought how to get ſomewhat, in the ill ordered diviſion of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withal more impudent, rudely killing thoſe, whom others would more wiſely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his Head againſt a Wall, upon ſome opinion of Contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary Quarrel, derived from his Father, whom ſhe could not abide. Her feminine malice did ſo exaſperate him, by cruelty, that ſhe uſed againſt his Friends, both alive and dead, as it made him adventure upon ſhedding the Royal Bloud; wherewith, when once he had ſtained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that courſe of Murder. His carefulneſs to deſtroy thoſe Women and Children, whoſe Lives hindred his purpoſe, argues him to have been rather skilful in matters of Arms, than a valiant man: ſuch cruelty being a true mark of cowardiſe, which fears afar off the dangers that may quietly paſs away: and ſeeks to avoid them by baſe and wicked means, as never thinking it ſelf ſafe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be ſaid, that they had well deſerved the bloudy end which overtook them; yet ill beſeemed it Caſſander to do the office of a Hangman. But Alexander's Children had by no Law of men deſerved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Caſſander died in his Bed, yet the divine Juſtice brought Swords upon his Wife and Children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloudy man, by deſtroying his whole Houſe, as he had done his Maſters.

Anti-

§. VII.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Caſſander's Children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedon; prevails in War againſt the Greeks; loſeth reputation in his War againſt Pyrrhus, and in his Civil Government, and prepares to win Aſia. How all conſpire againſt Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lyſimachus invade him; his Army yields to Pyrrhus, who ſhares the Kingdom of Macedon with Lyſimachus.

Pyrrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Æacides, which periſhed in War againſt Caſſander, was hardly preſerved, being a ſucking Infant, from the fury of his Fathers Enemies. When his Fofterers had conveyed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria, the deadly hatred of Caſſander would have bought his Life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that ſhall be his Heir. Glaucias was ſo far from betraying Pyrrhus, that he reſtored him by force to his Fathers Kingdom, when he was but twelve years of Age. Within the compaſs of ſix years, either the indiſcretions of his Youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drave him out of his Kingdom, and left him to try the World anew. Then went he to Demetrius, (who married his Siſter) became his Page; followed him a while in his Wars; was with him in the great Battel of Ipſus, whence he fled with him to Epheſus; and was content to be Hoſtage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Ægypt he ſo behaved himſelf, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomy's principal Wife; ſo that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon ſent home, with Money and Men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was ſetled in it, then fell out that Buſineſs between the Children of Caſſander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Caſſander's Sons, was ſo far too weak for Pyrrhus, that he had no deſire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an haſty Agreement, and divided the Kingdom with his younger Brother Alexander; who likewiſe felt the Aid of Pyrrhus ſo troubleſom, that he was more willing to ſend him away, than to call in ſuch another Helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to requeſt, or take as granted, by ſtrong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrey, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two Brethren to agree as well as they could about the reſt. Neceſſity inforced the Brethren to Compoſition: but their Compoſition would not ſatisfie Demetrius, who took the matter hainouſly, that he was ſent for, and made a Fool, to come ſo far with an Army, and find no work for it. This was a frivolous Complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpoſe to do as Pyrrhus had done, and ſo much more, by how much he was ſtronger. Hereupon it ſeemed to Alexander a wiſe courſe, to remove this over-diligent Friend, by murdering him upon ſome advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the Story, and it might be true; though the greateſt part, and perhaps the wiſeſt, believed it not. But the iſſue was, that Alexander himſelf was feaſted and ſlain by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the Murder; excuſing the fact ſo well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Caſſander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the ſame time Lyſimachus was buſied in War with a King of the wild Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to ſeek Peace of Demetrius, which to obtain, he cauſed the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill Bargain Antipater grievouſly ſtormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet ſtill he ſtormed; until his Father-in-law, to ſave the labour of making many excuſes, took away his troubleſome Life. Thus in haſte, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid moleſtation, were ſlain the Children of Caſſander: of Caſſander that had ſlain his own Maſters Children, in a wiſe courſe of policy, with careful meditation (ſo much the more wicked as the more long) ſtudying how to erect his own Houſe, that fell down upon his Grave, ere the Earth on it was throughly ſetled.

It might be thought, that ſuch an acceſs of Dominion, added much to the greatneſs of Demetrius. But indeed it ſhewed his Infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of Civil Government: but thought (or ſhewed by his actions that he thought) the uſe and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to do what a King liſted. He gave himſelf over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at thoſe that offered to trouble him with Supplications, and the tedious diſcourſe of doing Juſtice. He hath more skill in getting a Kingdom than in ruling it: War being his Recreation, and Luxury his Nature. By long reſt (as ſix years Raign is long to him, that knows not how to raign one year) he discovered so much of his worst condition, as made both the People weary of his Idleness; and the Souldiers, of his Vanity. He was freed from care of Matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost, though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his Victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the Peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another Expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made Excursions into Thessaly; but there needed not any handsom pretence of Quarrel, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough to over-run his Enemies Countrey, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom later Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexander's followers. At this time, he misled that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good Conduct, than of his private Valour, shewed in single Combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of Body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loss of this Battel did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexander's Graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely Vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him indeed, in performing the office of a Captain.

Raign

These Rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to dis-esteem, not so much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrey, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his Insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His Apparel seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly, to be a daily witness, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers lives he was rechless: and suffered unwisely this un-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of Popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor suiters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into the River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his Bed: who recovering health, and taking the Field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the general hate; which to redress, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia, with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one Battel might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made Peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse: with a Navy of five hundred Sayl, wherein were many Ships, far exceeding the greatness of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and useful withal, that the greatness was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these Preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their own Forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn against this ambitious Son of Antigonus; that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no security for his Friends in Europe; what League soever were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that Quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilst he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not over-great: were it not, that minds prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold upon small occasions of dislike. All the Camp was in uproar: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter seditious words, and many desired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own Houses, meaning indeed to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their own Countreyman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by Victory against the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deal with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his Valour; some enquired, others answered, of his Person, his Armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a pair of Goats Horns, that he wore on his Crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To try this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himself bareheaded in view of the Camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcom. The news of his arrival found a general applause, and every one began to look out, with desire to set eye on him. His Face was not so well known as his Helmet; there-therefore he was admoniſhed to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their Service; neither were there any that ſpake for Demetrius; only ſome (and they the moſt moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and ſhift for himſelf. So Demetrius threw aſide his Maskers Habit, and attiring himſelf poorly, did fearfully ſteal away out of his own Camp: deſerving well this calamity, whether it were ſo, that he would not hearken to the good counſel of his Friends, or whether, his behaviour deprived him of ſuch Friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleaſant ſound of neceſſary truth.

Whileſt Pyrrhus was making this Triumphant Entry into the Kingdom of Macedon, Lyſimachus came upon him very unſeaſonably, and would needs have half; ſaying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the War, and therefore had reaſon to challenge his part of the gains. The bargain was quickly made, and the diviſion agreed upon; each of them being rather deſirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all upon better opportunity.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterpriſed many things with ill ſucceſs, in Greece and Aſia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himſelf. His Impriſonment and Death.

THE Athenians were as unthankful to Demetrius in this his Adverſity, as they had been in former times. For they preſently forſook his Friendſhip, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went againſt Lyſimachus, had left a great part of his Forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had ſoon gotten an Army; though Phila his Wife (who is highly commended for a wiſe and vertuous Lady) did Poiſon her ſelf, upon deſperate grief of his misfortune. The firſt upon whom he attempted to ſhew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deſerved it. He began to lay Siege to their Town; but was pacified by Crates the Philoſopher, whom they made their Spokeſman; and taking fair words inſtead of ſatisfaction, paſſed over into Aſia with eleven thouſand Souldiers, meaning to try his Fortune againſt Lyſimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his firſt coming into thoſe parts Fortune ſeemed to ſmile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulſion, yielded to his obedience. There were alſo ſome Captains, that fell from Lyſimachus to him, with their Companies and Treaſures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles, the Son of Lyſimachus, came upon him with an Army ſo ſtrong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his laſt ſtock againſt it. Wherefore, he reſolved to paſs through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Aſia; truſting to find a Kingdom ſomewhere in thoſe remote quarters. The execution of this counſel was grievouſly impeached by Agathocles; who purſued him cloſe, and cut off all his Proviſions, driving him to take which ways he could, without following his intended courſe. In many skirmiſhes, Demetrius vanquiſhed this troubleſome Enemy: nevertheleſs, he could not be ſhaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titulary King with extream Famine. At length, in paſſing the River Lycus, ſo many of Demetrius his men were loſt, that the reſt could no longer make reſiſtance; but were driven to travel with ſuch ſpeed, as might well be called a plain flight. So that with Famine, Peſtilent Diſeaſes following Famine, and other accidents of War, eight thouſand of them were conſumed: the reſt, with their Captain, eſcaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten poſſeſſion of Cilicia, whileſt Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehement and humble Letters he beſought his Son-in-law to call to mind their Alliance, and to pity him in his great miſery. Theſe Letters, at the firſt, wrought well with Seleucus, and he condeſcended to the requeſt: yet conſidering further how Demetrius had carried himſelf, when he recovered ſtrength after the Battel at Ipſus, he changed his purpoſe, and went againſt him with an Army.

Many Treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealouſie of Seleucus. Therefore, meer deſperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man; and his fury got him ſome Victories, though of ſmall importance. At length, ſickneſs took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the Enemy. This notwithſtanding he ſtill held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been diſcovered by Fugitives, that gave the Alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forſaken him, and left him, with a few of his Friends, to ſhift for himſelf: he was compelled, by the laſt of thoſe adherents (for even ſome of thoſe few forſook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and ſent him very comfortable meſſages. But the approbation of his own Humanity, by his followers, was ſuch, as renewed his jealous thoughts, and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his preſence; though otherwiſe he uſed him with as much favour, as any Priſoner could wiſh. He was kept under ſure Guard in a Demi-Iſland, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for Hunting. He had all that he asked Royally, and Friends allowed to viſit him, at his, and their pleaſure. Only his Liberty was reſerved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the High Countries. In this ſort he ſpent three years, living merrily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happineſs, which with ſo much Travel and Bloud-ſhed, he had ſought in vain) and then died, leaving to his Son Antigonus, the ſame which his Father had left unto himſelf; that is, Friends and Hope. His aſhes were honourably buried in Corinth; his Qualities have appeared in his Actions, and the Fortune of his Houſe will ſhew it ſelf hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lyſimachus, and of Seleucus, that was laſt of Alexander's Captains: with other occurrences.

ABout the ſame time that Demetrius died, died alſo Ptolomy King of Ægypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountiful, and (which in thoſe times was a rare commendation) regardful of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many Children: out of whom he ſelected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and cauſed him to raign together with himſelf, two or three years before he died, that ſo he might confirm him in the inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that Houſe aſſumed the name of Ptolomy) was grievouſly incenſed: but no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving Entertainment. There were now only two of Alexander's Captains left; Seleucus and Lyſimachus. Theſe two needs would fight for it, who ſhould be the longeſt liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their Quarrel was, their near equality of ſtrength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was, the Murders which Lyſimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poiſoning Agathocles his eldeſt Son; whoſe Wife and Children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after ſeven Months pauſe, having ſpent their firſt heat of admiration, began to hearken ſo well to Lyſimachus, their natural Country-man, that they forſook Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than becauſe he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before; but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gave him. Lyſimachus had raigned about five years alone, when the City of Lyſimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an Earthquake, appeared, by events, to have fore-ſhewed the fall of his Houſe. His own jealouſie, and the inſtigation of a Mother-in-law, cauſed him to poiſon his Son Agathocles, which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loſs of all his fifteen Children, that were taken away by divers accidents) he periſhed himſelf.

Seleucus was encountred by Lyſimachus on Aſia ſide, where one Battel concluded the War, with Lyſimachus his death. It pleaſed Seleucus more than the Victory, that he was the laſt of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he ſeemed to himſelf, as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he paſſed over into Macedon, to take poſſeſſion of Europe, where there was none to withſtand him. But there he ended his days, and within ſeven Months followed Lyſimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloudy death; being treacherouſly ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whole Friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and ſeven years old he was, when he fought with Lyſimachus, and Lyſimachus was ſeventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had ſeen the days, as it were of another World under the Perſian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War; even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we ſpake before; that is now ready to enter into War with the Romans, a more Warlike People, than Alexander himſelf ever did encounter. Of which War, and of which People, it is needful that we here make mention, as of a ſtory more important, than any likely to enſue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms, that were held by Alexander's Succeſſors, with leſs (and ſtill decreaſing) vertue, than was that, by which they were firſt purchaſed.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome; and ſettling of the Eaſtern Kingdoms.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hoſtilius, unto ſuch time as they were aſſailed by Pyrrhus.

HOW Rome was founded by Romulus, ſetled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though ſmall Victories, it gathered ſtrength; unto ſuch time as it became the Head of Latium, by the Conqueſt of Alba, in the Reign of Tullus Hoſtilius, it hath been already noted in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatneſs beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it ſelf out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like caſes I have done) briefly to ſet down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of thoſe many actions, which could not have been delivered in the Ages, wherein they were ſeverally performed, without much interruption of the Hiſtory, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hoſtilius (who when he had raigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his Houſe by Lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in diſpoſition, ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about, enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he encloſed; built a Bridge over Tybris, and the City of Oſtia upon the Sea, ſixteen miles diſtant from Rome. Finally, having raigned four and twenty years, he died, and by his laſt Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the Son of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypſelus King of Corinth his Tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by ſome ominous occurrents, together with his Wife Tanaquils Propheſie, he grew a Favourite of Ancus Martius; by his Græcian wit humouring the Factions of the Roman Court, in ſo much that after his deceaſe, he became not only Protector to the Children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged enlarged the Centuries of Horſe-men: neither was he leſs eminent in War than in Peace: for he prevailed often againſt the Tuſcans, and from his Victories, the chiefeſt Ornaments of Triumph took their Original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had raigned eight and thirty years, he was ſlain by the Sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his Wife, perceiving what was done, informed the People from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and ſick, but not dangerouſly: And withall ſignified unto them, that in the interim of his ſickneſs, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth ſhe always Prophecied to be born to great hopes, (the Son of P. Corniculanus and Ocriſia, a well deſcended, but Captive Woman) brought up in her Houſe, and Husband unto her Daughter, ſhould ſupply her Husbands place, in Governing the State, until his recovery: which Government, being thus at firſt obtained by cunning, he afterwards uſurped as his right. He firſt ordained Ratements, Subſidies, and Valuations of the Peoples Wealth; among whom, at that time, fourſcore thouſand were muſtered, of which number conſiſted their whole Corporation; and by diſtinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good ſort, as if it had been a private Houſhold. At length, having two Daughters of different natures, the one mild and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding alſo that the two Sons of Tarquinius Priſcus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed to his Tuition, were of different diſpoſitions, proportionably anſwering to his Daughters; he (willing to add Water, not Oyl, to Fire) gave the mild Daughter to Sextus, the hot-headed Son; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in Marriage. But whether by intended courſes, or by accident, it happened; the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in Marriage: who ſoon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this Tumult, Servius Tullius haſting to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Inſolency) was thrown down the ſtairs, and going home ſore bruiſed, was ſlain by the way, when he had raigned forty and four years. Then Tullia his Daughter, firſt proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to drive his Chariot over her Father's Corps; whereupon the Street had the denomination of Wicked-ſtreet. This Tarquine, exerciſing Cruelty without Juſtice, and Tyranny without Mercy, upon the People and Senators; having tired himſelf and them at home, uſed the ſame rage of Treachery upon his Borders. He took Ocriculum, Sueſſa Pometia, and the Gabii. The iſſue of beſieging Ardea, a Town eighteen miles diſtant from Rome, was of bad ſucceſs. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently raviſhed that chaſte Lady Lucretia, his Kinſman Collatines Wife: who in way of expiation for ſo unchaſte a deed, thought good to waſh out thoſe ſpots of infamy with her own Bloud; ſo (having firſt bequeathed the revenge unto her Father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her Husband Collatine, and Junius Brutus) ſhe killed her ſelf: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his reſolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his Wife and Children, was depoſed and baniſhed; and fled to Porſenna King of Hetruria for ſuccour, in the five and twentieth year of his Reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City; in which ſpace Rome had ſcarce gotten full poſſeſſion of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus, by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heavy yoak of Bondage, enforced the People by ſolemn Oath, never to admit any Government by Kings amongſt them: whereupon they ranſacked their Kings Goods, conſecrated their Fields to Mars, and conferred the Government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their Ears, they changed the manner of their Government, from perpetual to annual, and from a ſingle Governour to a double; leſt perpetual or ſole Dominion might be ſome motive to Uſurpation: and inſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers; that their Titles might remember them of their place, which was to be always mindful of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſetling of troubled Waters, that the People, after this innovation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelves of their own ſecurity, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſign up his Authority, fearing that Tyranny would be Hereditary, and ſuppoſing that the very name and affinity with the Houſe of Tarquin, ſavoured already of their condition. In his room was ſubſtituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gratious in the Peoples Eyes, gave liberty, in matters of Controverſie, to appeal from the Conſuls to the People: and that he might as well in Goods as in Perſon, avoid occaſion of ſuſpicion, cauſed his own Houſe to be pulled down, becauſe it was built in a place defenſible, as if it had been a Cittadel. Neither was Brutus any ways deficient in matter of greater moment, which concerned as well the Peoples ſafety, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt rank his own Sons, were itching after innovations, hoping to reſtore the baniſhed Kings; he cauſed them, publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the block.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemiſhed integrity of Brutus, well appeaſed all inbred Quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their Military deſignments againſt Foreigners; firſt, for their Liberty; ſecondly, for enlarging of their Poſſeſſions; and laſtly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, ſituated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuſcans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her Minority, could not but give occaſion of offence to her Neighbours; until by main oppoſition, having prevailed againſt her borderers, ſhe uſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtain the reſt.

Their firſt War, in the firſt year of Conſuls, was againſt Porſenna King of Hetruria; who being overperſwaded by Tarquin's lamentation, came to Rome, together with the baniſhed King, and with great Forces, to ſeat him again in his Kingdom.

In the firſt conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his Enemies, on the Bridge over Tybris; at length, feeling himſelf too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the Bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his Armour, leaping into the River, like a hunted Stag, refreſhed his hot ſpirits, and returned ſafe to his fellows, with the like reſolution to ſuſtain a new charge. Porſenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the Hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance unto the City, and found the Victory, in a manner, aſſuredly his own: yet admiring their Valour, and terrified by the conſtant reſolution of Mutius Scævola (who having by error ſlain Porſenna his Secretary, inſtead of the King himſelf, ſelf, did in ſcorn of torments threatned, burn off his own Hand) he thought it not any whit prejudicial, either to his ſafety, or credit, to enter League with them at the worſt hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his ſpleen was not quite abated, though Arunς his Son, and Brutus his Enemy, in ſingle Combat, had ſlain each other. And here the Romans, although they loſt Brutus, got the Field; and their Ladies, whoſe Champion he was, for their Chaſtity, not for Beauty, mourned the loſs of him one whole year. Into his place, for the reſidue of his year, was ſubrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceaſing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, upon his overthrow, feeling the Fates diſaſtrous, thought it no boot to ſtrive againſt the ſtream; and ſpent the reſidue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tuſculum. Yet his Son-in-law, Mamilius Tuſculanus, ſtomaching afreſh at thoſe old repulſes, becauſe Porſenna had made Peace with the Romans, and denied further ſuccour unto the Tarquines, muſtered up his Latines, and gave Battel to the Romans at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the iſſue uncertain, until Aulus Poſthumius, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magiſtracy greater than Conſuls, purpoſely for this War, when firſt it was expected) to exaſperate his Souldiers courage, threw their own Enſigns amidſt the Enemy; and Coſſus, or Spurius Caſſius (Maſter of the Horſe-men, an aſſiſtant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their Bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Enſigns. This Fight was ſo well performed, that a report went currant, of Caſtor and Pollux, two Gods, who came on milk-white Steeds, to be Eye-witneſſes of their Valour, and fellow helpers of their Victory; for the General conſecrated a Temple to them, as a ſtipend for their pains. After this, the Romans fierce ſpirits, having no object of Valour abroad, reflected upon themſelves at home; and the ſixteenth year after the Kings expulſion, upon inſtigation of ſome deſperate bankrouts, thinking themſelves wrongfully oppreſſed by the Senate and Conſuls, they made an uproar in the Holy Mount; until by Menenius Agrippa, his diſcreet alluſion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies diſcord, to that preſent occaſion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have ſome new Magiſtrates created, to whom they might appeal in caſes of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controverſies, the Conſuls Authority notwithſtanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the People. After this attonement amongſt themſelves, they had continual War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other Neighbouring States. Amongſt theſe, the Volſci and Æqui held them longeſt; who made War, of themſelves, upon the Romans; whereby they loſt the beſt City in their whole Juriſdiction, Corioli.

In this Conqueſt, T. Martius got the ſirname of Coriolanus: a name honourable then, as derived from a great Victory; although by reaſon of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been aſhamed of that Title. But yet theſe graces had been no occaſion of diſparagement, had he not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, adviſed to ſell Corn, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the People: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accuſed him, and after Judgment, baniſhed him. Coriolanus flying to the Volſci, whom lately before he had vanquiſhed, incenſed them to renew their Forces again, which being committed unto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in Field ſo far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Encamping there, he made ſo ſharp War, and was at ſuch defiance with his Country, that he would not relent, by any ſupplications of Embaſſadors, until his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his Wife, with a pitiful tune of Deprecation, ſhewing themſelves better Subjects to their Country, than Friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome, than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus diſmiſſing his Army, was after put to death among the Volſci, as a Traytor, for neglecting ſuch opportunity: or (as others ſurmiſe) living with them until old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this, the Veii in Hetruria provoked the Romans; againſt whom the Fabii, three hundred and ſix in number, all of one Family, entreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private Quarrel. Theſe Fabii, after ſome good ſervices, lying encamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all ſlain; one only of that whole Houſe, had been left, by reaſon of infancy, at home; from whom afterward ſprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquiſhed Hannibal.

In proceſs of time, the Romans were alſo troubled with the Volſci, at the Hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Conſul, with his whole Army, had been diſcomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus, choſen Dictator, and taken from the Plough to the higheſt Honour in Rome, with ſucceſs anſwerable to his Expedition, diſperſed his Enemies, and freed his Country in the ſpace of ſixteen days. In the continuance of this Volſcian War it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before choſen Governours of the State, and enactors of Solon's Laws amongſt them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Conſuls, and all other Magiſtracies) would have raviſhed Virginia, the Daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a Company, and lying then in Camp at Algidum. Hereupon the People, in an uproar, took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to reſign up their Authority again to new Conſuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or deſire to revenge old loſſes, drew the Romans into a new War againſt the Veientes, and their adherents, upon whom having tried their Forces, with diverſity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquiſhed the Faliſci, and the Fidenates, and utterly ſubdued the Veientes. In conquering the Faliſci, Furius Camillus ſhewed no leſs integrity than fortitude. For when a School-Maſter, by training forth into the Roman Camp, many Children of the principal Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as Hoſtages: Camillus delivered this Traytor bound unto his Scholars, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forth-with yielded unto him in reverence of his Juſtice. The Siege of Veii was ten years, and ſo troubleſome, that the Romans were there firſt enforced to winter abroad under Beaſts skins (to which they were the more eaſily induced, becauſe then firſt they received Pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length, winning the City by a Mine, they got ſo large ſpoils, that they conſecrated their Tenths to Apollo Pythius; and the whole People in general, were called to the ranſacking of the City. But yet they were no leſs unthankful to Camillus for his ſervice, than before they had been to Coriolanus;

lanus; for they baniſhed him the City, upon ſome occaſion of inequality in dividing the ſpoils: yet he requited their unkindneſs with a new piece of ſervice, againſt the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Country, and very healthful, the Fathers (as ſometimes now) lived ſo long, that the Sons, deſtitute of means, were enforced to rove abroad, ſeeking ſome place, where to ſet up their reſt: and withal being a Nation vaſt in Body, rude by Nature, and barbarous in Conditions, wandred as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, ſet upon Cluſium, a Town in Hetruria; whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) ſent Embaſſadors, warning them to deſiſt from ſuch injurious enterpriſes. But the barbarous People, not regarding the Meſſage, upon ſome injury offered by the Roman Embaſſadors, converted their Forces from Cluſium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow to the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the ſixteenth day before the Calends of Auguſt (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Allienſis in the Roman Kalendar) they haſtened towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of miſery and deſolation. For ſome leaving the City, ſome creeping into holes, Prieſts hiding their Reliques, and every one ſhifting for himſelf; ere the Enemy came, Rome was abandoned, as indefenſible. The Veſtal Virgins, in this Tumult, were ſafely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldneſs out of deſperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the World, did ſeat themſelves in Thrones, in their ſeveral Houſes, hourly expecting the Meſſengers of Death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger ſort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this, the Gauls were entred the City, who ſeeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome Ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they fell to the ſpoil, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senators, that ſate in their Majeſty, with a grave reſolution: having firſt reverenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like Men. When the City was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitol; which held them work for the ſpace of ſeven Months. Once they were like to have ſurpriſed it by Night, but being deſcried by the gagling of Geeſe, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compoſition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls ſhould take a thouſand pound weight in Gold, to deſiſt from their Siege. Whileſt the Gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open inſolency, made their weights too heavy: Brennus, their Captain, caſting his Sword into the Balance, and, with a proud exprobration, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed muſt be patient perforce. But in the midſt of this cavilling, came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his baniſhment) and fell upon the Gauls with ſuch violence, that he diſperſed their Troops, quenched the fire of the City with their Bloud, forcing them to reſtore the ſpoils with advantage, and forbear the Gold, in accepting which, they had lately been ſo nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he ſo hotly purſued them through a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which eſcaped from him, was very ſmall. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this firſt, had the like ill ſucceſs. They were often beaten by the Romans; eſpecially the Victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in ſingle fight ſlew a Champion of the Gauls) abated their preſumption, and reſtored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable ſervice, was afterwards accounted a ſecond Romulus.

The People, after this deſtruction of their City, were earneſtly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus diſſwaded them.

About the ſame time, ſomewhat before the Siege of Veii, they changed their Government from Conſuls to Military Tribunes. The government of theſe alſo, after ſome years, was by civil diſſenſion interrupted: ſo that one while Conſuls ruled; another while there was an Anarchy: Then the Tribunes were reſtored and ruled again, till after many years expired, the Conſular Authority was eſtabliſhed; it being enacted, that one of the Conſuls ſhould always be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City, three hundred ſixty five years. And now Rome, by ſuppreſſion of her Neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares ſet forth againſt the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almoſt one hundred and thirty miles off, ſituated between Campania and Apulia. Theſe did ſo ſtrongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yield themſelves Subjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatſoever elſe, to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like Fiſh, ſhould devour the leſs, eaſily allowed of; aiming themſelves at the good ſituation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleaſant Cities and Towns, but eſpecially Capua it ſelf, the faireſt City then in all Italy.

The Families of the Papyrii and Fabii were moſt employed in the managing of this War, which endured the ſpace of fifty years. And in this ſeaſon were the Romans often-times dangerouſly encountred by the Samnites; as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Poſthumius were Conſuls; and diſcomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no ſmall ignominy; and when Q. Fabius Gurges loſt the Field with three thouſand men. But for theſe loſſes, many great Victories made large amends: The greateſt whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their Quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but leſs warlike Nation) began to ſtir. So the one and the other of theſe two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome.

In the continuance of this long War it was, (though in time of Truce between the Romans and the Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, ſo that they required to have one of the Conſuls yearly choſen out of them.

This demand of the Latines was not unreaſonable. For the Romans themſelves were a Latine Colony; beſides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any ſuch Capitulation. So a great Battel was fought between them; wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Conſuls.

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Conſuls, whom the Sooth-ſayers advertiſed, that the ſide ſhould be victorious which loſt the General in Fight. Hereupon, Decius the Conſul, expoſed his life to the Enemy, and purchaſed Victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himſelf for his Army, the Son of this Decius, being after Conſul, did imitate his Father, Father in the Hetrurian War. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decij, that purchased Victory, by rushing into the midst of the Enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a Religion as required the Lives of so worthy Citizens to be sacrificed for their Country. The Discipline of Manlius was no less resolute than the Valour of Decius. He forbad any one to forsake his Place, and fight single with an Enemy. For breach of which order, he caused his own Son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latines, being challenged in single Fight.

When the Latines, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other People, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any People of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their Fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, wasting all their Country with Fire and Sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made trial of the Roman Arms, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War unto that Party which should dare to refuse the Peace by them tendred. These Threats, which discovered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain Ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Embassadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Appulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebel and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these People to know their own Weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Græcian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already, in a manner it did overspread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two Battels.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no less than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsetled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the Power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive War upon him, without far greater forces. Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and Treasures left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of Imployment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave Offers, as needing none other aid than his good Conduct, which to obtain, they would cast themselves under his Protection. They had in their company some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalf of their several Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly Conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as far as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one Victory open the Gate unto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cyneas his chief Counsellor, asking what he meant to do after every of the Victories which he hoped to get: that, having won Rome, he would soon be Master of all Italy; that, after Italy, he would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that out of Sicil he would pass over into Africk, and win Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further what they should do, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheless this Italian expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any Scholastial Disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming he found the Tarentines very prompt of Tongue, but in matter of Execution, utterly careless to provide for the War. Wherefore he was fain to shut up their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Arms, and making such a strickt Muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behooving to their Estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lævinus the Roman Consul drew near, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were careless of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their Valour was little: all of these had been accustomed to shrink, for fear of the Roman Fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own Forces, than the issue of their vaunting Promises. He was now driven, either to set forward with those that himself had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his Forces that had been scattered by foul Weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the Valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Lævinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible Name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him Battel ere all his Adherents should be ready to joyn with him.

This

This boldneſs of the Roman, and the ſlackneſs of the Meſſapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moſt concerned, cauſed Pyrrhus to offer a Treaty of Peace: requiring to have the Quarrel between the Romans and his Italian Friends, referred to his Arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their Fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, conſidering better at near diſtance, the weight of the buſineſs which he had taken in hand, he were deſirous to quit it with his Honour; the ſhort anſwer that was returned to his Propoſition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans ſent him this Word, that they had neither choſen him their Judge, nor feared him their Enemy.

Hereupon both Armies haſtened their March unto the River of Siris: Lævinus intending to fight, before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from paſſing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the firſt view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous People, but with men well trained in a brave diſcipline of War: which cauſed him to ſet a ſtrong Corps de garde upon the Paſſage of the River, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he ſaw his beſt advantage. But he quickly found that this new Enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord in face of his Corps de garde; and their Horſe, at the ſame time began to paſs the River in ſundry places: which cauſed the Greeks to forſake the defence of their Bank, and ſpeedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to Battel, wherewith he thought it beſt to preſent them ere their whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marſhal his Battails, himſelf with the Horſe charged upon the Romans, who ſtoutly received him, as men well exerciſed in ſuſtaining furious impreſſions. In this Fight, neither did his Courage tranſport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifeſtation of his perſonal Valour. It behooved him indeed to do his beſt, for he never met with better Oppoſers. Once, and ſhortly after the Fight began, his Horſe was ſlain under him: afterwards he changed Armour with a Friend; but that Friend paid his Life for the uſe of his Kings Armour, which was torn from his Back. This accident had almoſt loſt him the Battel: but he perceiving it, diſcovered his Face, and thereby reſtored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The Fight was obſtinate, and with the greater loſs (at leaſt of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his ſide, as long as only Spear and Sword were uſed. But when the Elephants were brought into the Wings, whoſe unuſual form and terrible aſpect the Horſes of the Romans (unaccuſtomed to the like) were not able to ſuſtain; then was the Victory quickly gotten. For the Roman Battails perceiving their Horſe put to rout, and driven out of the Field; finding alſo themſelves both charged in Flank, and overborn by the force and huge bulk of theſe ſtrange Beaſts; gave way to neceſſity, and ſaved themſelves as well as they could by haſty flight: in which conſternation, they were ſo forgetful of their Diſcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it and the honour of the day entirely to Pyrrhus.

The Fame of this Victory was ſoon ſpread over Italy; and the Reputation was no leſs than the Fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Conſul, with a ſelect Army, ſhould loſe in plain Battel, not only the Field, but the Camp it ſelf, being ſo notably fortified as they always were. And this Honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian Friends, ſave the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well diſſemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this Action peculiarly his own, at ſuch time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites for coming (as we ſay) a day after the fair. Nevertheleſs he wiſely conſidered the ſtrength of the Romans, which was ſuch as would better endure many ſuch Loſſes, than he could many ſuch Victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whileſt with his Honour he might; and to that purpoſe he ſent unto them Cyneas his Embaſſador; demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at reſt, and himſelf accepted as their eſpecial Friend. This did Cyneas, with all his Cunning, and with liberal Gifts, labour to effect: but neither Man nor Woman could be found in Rome, that would take any Bribe of him; neither did their deſire of recovering their Captives, or their danger, by the riſing of many States in Italy againſt them, ſo incline them to Peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did ſtir them up to make good their Honour by War. So they returned anſwer, that whileſt Pyrrhus aboad in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puiſſance and Vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great deſire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices paſſed between them: but ſtill when he urged his motion of Peace, the anſwer was, He muſt firſt depart out of Italy, and then treat of Peace.

In the mean ſeaſon each part made proviſion for War; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being ſtrengthened with acceſs unto his Forces, of all the Eaſt parts of Italy. So they came to trial of a ſecond Battel, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boiſtrous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a ſecond Victory. But this was not altogether ſo joyful as the former had been: rather it gave him cauſe to ſay, that ſuch another Victory would be his utter undoing. For he had loſt the Flower of his Army in this Battel, and though he drave the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor ſaw any likelihood of prevailing againſt them that were like to be relieved with daily ſupplies, whileſt he ſhould be driven to ſpend upon his old Stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants ſhould always ſtand him in ſtead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would ſoon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in ſuch Learning, how to make them unſerviceable. Wherefore he deſired nothing more, than how to carry his Honour ſafe out of Italy: which to do (ſeeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of Peace or of Truce) he took a ſlight occaſion, preſented by Fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great Troubles in Macedon and Sicil. How Pyrrhus being invited into Sicil, forsook Italy; won the most of the Isle, and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italy; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his own Kingdom.

WHen Ptolomy Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had slain the Conquerour. The Houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himself against Ceraunus. The Friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lords Death, than any way offended with the odiousness of his Fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his Fathers great Vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his Raign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeat Antigonus the Son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antiochus, the Son of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Army near unto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to revenge his Fathers Death: but being stronger in Money than in Arms, he was content, after a while, to take fair words, and make peace with the Murtherer. While these three strove about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus, who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made use of their dissention: threatning War, or promising his assistance to every one of them. By these means he strengthened himself, and greatly advantaged his Italian Voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting Money of Antiochus, Ships of Antigonus, and Souldiers of Ptolomy, who gave him his Daughter in Marriage, and lent him a strong Power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them restored at two years end) more for Fear than for Love: that so he might free himself from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom. Thus Ptolomy grew mighty on the suddain; and the Power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong City of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his Sister, the Widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her young Children. Her he circumvented by making Love to her, and (according to the Fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinity) taking her to Wife, with promise to adopt her Children: a Promise that he meant not to perform; for it was not long ere he slew them and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good success which his Villany found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the fury of a Nation that he had never heard of. Belgius a Captain of the Gauls, having forced his passage through many Countries, unto the Confines of Macedon, sent a proud Message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy Peace with Money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of War. These Gauls were the Race of those that issued out of their Country, to seek new Seats in that great Expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themselves at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell upon Italy, the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northern side of the Adriatick Sea, made long aboad in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeem Peace with Tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to do, unto whose Borders they came, about an hundred and eight years after such time as their Fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomy, asking what he would give: His answer was, that he would be contented to give them Peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as Hostages, and yield up their Arms, for otherwise, he would neither pardon their Boldness, nor give any credit to their Words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, that they would soon confute with Deeds the Vanity of such proud Words. It may seem strange, that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus for very fear, should be so confident in undertaking more mighty Enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls, but he scorned the offer; saying, that he had the Children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against the barbarous People, with his famous Macedonians, as if the Victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great Name. But he soon found his great Error, when it was too late. For the Enemies were not only equal in strength of Body, and fierceness of Courage, but so far superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their Fury. Ptolomy himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands whilest the Battel continued, and they presently strook off his Head, which they shewed to his men on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The Report of this great Overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the People fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Country as lost. Only Sosthenes, a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper hand, and hindred Belgius from using the Victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his Vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King, which Title he refused, and was content with the Name of a General. But (as mischiefs do seldom come alone) the good success of Belgius, drew into Macedon Brennus, another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand Foot, and fifteen thousand Horse; against which mighty Army, when Sosthenes with his weak Troops made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their Walls, leaving all the Country to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of in less than fifty years after the Death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these News been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who sought a fair pretext of relinquishing his War with the Romans, had not other other tidings out of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who raigned over the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Army to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had been expelled. This Army did so fast prevail, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoid slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Græcian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well known heavy yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principal Estates of the Isle, sent Ambassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he believed (as came after to pass) that his advantage, upon Macedon, would not so hastily pass away, but that he might find some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, over into Sicil he transported his Army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Town, to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italy, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, until his return unto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or note-worthy. The Army which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse: with which, soon after his descent in Sicil, he forc'd the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also won the strong City of Eryx; and having beaten the Mamertines in Battel, he began to change condition, and turn Tyrant. For he drave Sostratus (to whom his cruelty was suspect) out of the Island, and put Thenon of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatness; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich City of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his Fortunes declined so fast, as he served himself, and salved the dis-reputation of his leaving Sicil, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present help against the Romans, who since his leaving Italy, had well near dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this fair occasion, he imbarked for Italy; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italy it self, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Country. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third Battel with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc'd him out of Italy, into his own Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant, and had he been but a General of an Army, for some other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdom, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no less honour, than any man of War, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captain, or a valianter man, hath been no where found. But he never staid upon any Enterprize; which was, indeed, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IV.

How Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE vertue of Sosthenes being too weak, to defend the Kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his Attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no less glad to submit themselves unto the Government of Antigonus, than they had formerly been desirous, to free themselves, from the impotent Rule of his Father Demetrius. His coming into the Country, with an Army, Navy, and Treasure, beseeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, only those Forces, which he brought with him, having none other than good wishes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the main strength of his Army, was gone to spoyl the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behind him, than he thought necessary to guard the Borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their Fellows: and therefore sent unto Antigonus, offering to sell him Peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his Reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exasperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or usage, as Ceraunus had overfondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Ambassadors in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royal Feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such abundance of massie Gold and Silver, that they were not so much delighted with the Meat, as with sight of the Vessels, wherein it was served. He thought hereby, to make them understand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them, his Camp and Navy, but especially his Elephants. But all this bravery served only to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his Ships heavy loaden, his Camp full of Wealth, and ill fortified, himself (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferior unto the Gauls: thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors, to spend the Riches, which they accounted assuredly their own. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other news in their mouths, than of Spoyl and Purchase: which Tale, carried the Gauls head-long, to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater Booty, than the Victory over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and sudden; yet not so sudden, but that Antigonus had notice of it: who distrusting the courage of his own men, dislodged somewhat before their arrival, and conveyed himself, with his whole Army and Carriage, into certain Woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empty Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vain, angry at their lost labour, they marched with all speed toward the Sea-side; that they might fall upon him, whilſt he was buſie in getting his Men and Carriages a Ship-board. But the ſucceſs was no way anſwerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were ſo careleſs of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the ſpoyl of what they found on the ſhore, and in ſuch Ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert, and had ſaved it ſelf by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were ſome well experienced men of War, who diſcovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the deſperate preſumption of their Enemies, took courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great reſolution, gave ſo brave a charge upon the diſordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldneſs was thereby changed into ſudden fear, and they, after a great ſlaughter, driven to caſt themſelves into the ſervice of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory, cauſed all the barbarous Nations in thoſe Quarters, to re-entertain their ancient belief of the Macedonian Valour: by which, the terrible and reſiſtleſs oppreſſors of ſo many Countreys, were overthrown.

To ſpeak more of the Gaules, in this place; and to ſhew how, about theſe Times, three Tribes of them paſſed over into Aſia the leſs, with their Wars and Conqueſts there; I hold it needleſs: the victorious Arms of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countreys which now they wan, ſhall give better occaſion, to rehearſe theſe Matters briefly.

Howſoever the good ſucceſs of Antigonus got him Reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading, had won this Victory, could not thereupon be perſwaded, to think him a good man of War: knowing that he had no intereſt in the honour of the Service, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a Wood.

This (as preſently will appear) was greatly helpful unto Pyrrhus: though as yet, he knew not ſo much. For Pyrrhus, when his Affairs in Italy ſtood upon hard terms, had ſent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats, in caſe it were denied. So was he ſure to get, either a ſupply, wherewith to continue his War againſt the Romans, or ſome ſeeming honourable pretence, to forſake Italy, under colour of making his word good, in ſeeking revenge. The threats which he had uſed in bravery, meer neceſſity forced him, at his return into Epirus, to put in practice.

He brought home with him, eight thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe: an Army too little to be imployed, by his reſtleſs nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in Pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what Spoyl he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his firſt entrance into this Buſineſs, two thouſand of Antigonus his Souldiers, revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings, eaſily perſwaded the courage of this daring Prince, to ſet upon Antigonus himſelf, and to hazard his fortune, in tryal of a Battel, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no deſire to fight, with this hot Warrior; but thought it the wiſeſt way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the Countrey. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a ſtraight paſſage, and charged him in the Rear; wherein were the Gauls, and the Elephants, which were thought the beſt of his ſtrength: a manifeſt proof that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely ſuſtained Pyrrhus his impreſſion; yet were broken at length (when moſt of them were ſlain) after a ſharp Fight: wherein it ſeems, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the ſtreight, and not advancing to their ſuccour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken ſoon after; who, finding themſelves expoſed to the ſame violence, that had conſumed ſo many of the Gauls, yielded themſelves and the Beaſts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great diſcomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their ſtrength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a Front, it was a matter of extream difficulty (if not impoſſible) to force it. But the Macedonians had ſeen ſo much, that they had no deſire to fight againſt Pyrrhus; who diſcovered ſo well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in perſon, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refuſed to become his follower. All forſook Antigonus, a few Horſe-men excepted, that fled along with him to Theſſalonica; where he had ſome ſmall Forces left, and Money enough to entertain a greater Power, had he known where to levy it. But whilſt he was thinking, how to allure a ſufficient number of the Gauls into his ſervice; whereby he might repair his loſs: Ptolomy, the Son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and eaſily defeating his weak Forces, drave him to fly from the Parts about Macedon, to thoſe Towns afar off in Peloponneſus, in which he had formerly lurked, before ſuch time as he looked abroad into the World, and made himſelf a King.

This good ſucceſs revived the ſpirits of the Epirot, and cauſed him to forget all ſorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman War: ſo that he ſent for his Son Helenus (whom he had left with a Garriſon, in the Caſtle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of Conqueſt, and let the Italians ſhift for themſelves.

§. V.

How Pyrrhus aſſailed Sparta without ſucceſs. His Enterprize upon Argos, and his Death.

Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope, that nothing ſhould be able to withſtand him; ſeeing, that in open Fight, he had vanquiſhed the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of ſuch name and worth, as deſerved to be ſet up againſt him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleaſed. He raiſed therefore an Army, conſiſting of five and twenty thouſand Foot, two thouſand Horſe, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending War againſt Antigonus, and the giving liberty to thoſe Towns in Peloponneſus, which the ſame Antigonus held in ſubjection; though it was eaſily diſcovered, that ſuch great Preparations were made, for accompliſhment of ſome Deſign more important, than War againſt a Prince already vanquiſhed, and almoſt utterly dejected. Eſpecially the Lacedæmonians feared this Expedition, as made againſt their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himſelf to Pyrrhus: who readily readily entertained him, and promiſed to reſtore him to his Kingdom. This promiſe was made in ſecret; neither would Pyrrhus make ſhew of any diſpleaſure, that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwiſe profeſſed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger Sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble diſcipline. With ſuch colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where preſently he demeaned himſelf as an open Enemy: excuſing himſelf, and his former diſſembling words, with a jeſt; That he followed herein the Lacedæmonian cuſtom, of concealing what was truly purpoſed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deal in like ſort with others, whom, in the time of their greatneſs, they ſought to oppreſs: but now they complained of that, as falſhood, in Pyrrhus, which they always practiſed as wiſdom, till it made them diſtruſted, forſaken, and almoſt contemptible. Nevertheleſs, they were not wanting to themſelves, in this dangerous extremity. For the old Men and Women laboured in fortifying the Town; cauſing ſuch as could bear Arms, to reſerve themſelves freſh againſt the Aſſault: which Pyrrhus had unwiſely deferred, upon aſſurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwiſe than with armed Citizens: ſoon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and for the moſt part hard to approach) the lower and more acceſſible Places, were fenced with Walls; at the preſent, only Trenches were caſt, and Barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance ſeemed moſt eaſie. Three days together it was aſſailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no leſs ſtoutly defended. The deſperate courage of the Citizens preſerved the Town the firſt day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the ſecond day, but that his wounded Horſe threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindful of ſaving the Perſon of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn aſunder the Barricadoes. Preſently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta, with a good ſtrength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his Friends in War) with two thouſand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Countrey ſtood, until he was almoſt at home. Theſe Succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a deſire to prevail againſt all Impediments. But the third days work ſhewed, how great his error had been, in forbearing to aſſault the Town at his firſt coming. For he was ſo manfully repelled, that he ſaw no likelihood of getting the Place, otherwiſe than by a long Siege: in which tedious courſe, he had no deſire to ſpend his time.

Antigonus had now raiſed an Army, though not ſtrong enough to meet the Enemy in plain Field, yet able to hinder all his Purpoſes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take; being diverſly affected, by the difficulty of his Enterprize in hand, and the ſhame of taking a repulſe in his firſt Attempt. Whilſt he was thus perplexed, Letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promiſe, to deliver that City into his hands.

Civil Diſſention raging then hotly in Argos, cauſed the Heads of ſeveral Factions, to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of theſe two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them deſirous, to rid their hands of ſuch powerful Aſſiſtants, as each of the two Kings pretended himſelf to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to ſave them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus; and that he would be gone if they needed not his help. On the other ſide, Pyrrhus would needs perſwade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them ſafe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they ſo deſired.

The Argives took ſmall pleaſure, in hearing the Fox and Kite at ſtrife, which of them ſhould keep the Chickens from his Enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to divert their Powers ſome other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condeſcended, and gave Hoſtages to aſſure his word: for he was the weaker, and ſtood in need of goodwill. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promiſe: Hoſtages he would give none, to his inferiors; eſpecially, meaning deceit. This made them ſuſpect his purpoſe to be ſuch, as, indeed, it was. Yet he leſs regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of aſſurance, by giving ſuch a Bond, as he intended to break ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City ſhould be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army, without any tumult, entred the City: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to paſs the Gate. The taking off, and ſetting on again, of thoſe Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarm to the City, and ſome leiſure to take order for defence, before ſo many were entred, as could fully maſter it. Argos was full of Ditches, which greatly hindred the Gauls (that had the Vantgard) being ignorant of the ways, in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other ſide, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-paſſage: and ſetting upon the Enemies on all ſides, did put them to great loſs, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, underſtanding by the confuſed noiſe, and unequal ſhoutings of his own men, that they were in diſtreſs, entred the City in perſon, to take order for their relief, and aſſurance of the Place. But the darkneſs, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, until break of day. Then began he to make his paſſage by force, and ſo far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is ſaid, that ſeeing in that Place, the Image of a Wolf and a Bull, in ſuch poſture as if they had been combatant, he called to mind an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he ſhould behold a Bull fighting with a Wolf: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the reſcue, the diſorder and confuſion of his own men; with divers ill accidents, gave him reaſonable cauſe to have retired out of the City, though the Wolf and Bull had been away. The tumult was ſuch, that no directions could be heard; but as ſome gave back, ſo did others thruſt forward, and the Argives preſſing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat, with his own Sword. The tops of the Houſes were covered with Women, that ſtood looking on the Fight. Among theſe was one, that ſaw her own Son in dangerous caſe, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, ſhe took a Tile-ſtone, or Slate, and threw it ſo violently down on the Head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground aſtoniſhed with the Blow; and lying in that caſe, had his Head cut off.

Thus ended the reſtleſs Ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his Life: and thus returned the Kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith poſſeſſed the Army, the Body, and the Children of his Enemy. The Body of Pyrrhus, had honourable Funeral, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his Son; which young Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdom of Epirus. From this time forwards, the Race of Antigonus, held the Kingdom of Macedon; the Posterity of Seleucus, raigned over Asia and Syria; and the House of Ptolomy had quiet possession of Ægypt: until such time, as the City of Rome, swallowing all up, digested these, among other Countreys, into the body of her own Empire.

The FIFTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the firſt Punick War.

§. I.

A diſcuſſion of that Problem of Livie; Whether the Romans could have reſiſted the great Alexander? That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equal Valour to the Engliſh.

THAT Queſtion handled by Livie; Whether the great Alexander could have prevailed againſt the Romans, if after his Eaſtern Conqueſt, he had bent all his Forces againſt them, hath been, and is, the ſubject of much diſpute; which (as it ſeems to me) the Arguments on both ſides do not ſo well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given, of the Roman Power, in his days. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibal's judgment) inferiour to Alexander, though to none elſe, could with ſmall ſtrength of Men, and little ſtore of Money, or of other needful helps in War, vanquiſh them in two Battels, and endanger their Eſtate, when it was well ſettled, and held the beſt part of Italy under a confirmed Obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needful to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of Employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half ſo well ſettled. It is eaſie to ſay, that Alexander had no more than thirty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe (as indeed, at his firſt paſſage into Aſia, he he carried over not many more) and that the reſt of his followers were no better than baſe effeminate Aſiatiques. But he that conſiders the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomy, Antigonus, and Lyſimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only ſome fragment of this dead Emperours power; ſhall eaſily find, that ſuch a reckoning is far ſhort of the truth.

It were needleſs to ſpeak of Treaſure, Horſes, Elephants, Engines of Battery, and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, ſave Men and Arms. As for Sea-forces; he that ſhall conſider after what ſort the Romans, in their firſt Punick War, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation, ſitting upon the ſhoar, and beating the Sand with Poles, to practice the ſtroke of the Oar, as not daring to lanch their ill-built Veſſels into the Sea; will eaſily conceive, how far too weak they would have proved in ſuch Services.

Now for helpers in War; I do not ſee, why all Greece and Macedon, being abſolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deſerve to be laid in Balance againſt thoſe parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-aſſured ſubjection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Eaſtern World, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonian: let us only conjecture, how the States of Sicil and Carthage, neareſt Neighbours to ſuch a Quarrel (had it happened) would have ſtood affected. The Sicilians were, for the moſt part, Græcians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have ſubmitted themſelves unto him, that ruled all Greece beſides them. In what terms they commonly ſtood, and how ill they were able to defend themſelves, it ſhall appear anon. Sure it is, that Alexander's coming into thoſe parts, would have brought exceſſive joy to them that were fain to get the help of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his Subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuſe, hated of his People, and ill able to defend his own beſieged City, could, by adventuring to ſail into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it ſelf, in extream hazard; ſhall we think that they would have been able to withſtand Alexander? But, why do I queſtion their ability, ſeeing that they ſent Embaſſadors, with their ſubmiſſion, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew near them? Wherefore it is manifeſt, that the Romans muſt, without other ſuccour, than perhaps of ſome few Italian Friends (of which yet there were none that forſook them not, at ſome time, both before and after this) have oppoſed their Valour, and good Military Diſcipline, againſt the power of all Countries, to them known, if they would have made reſiſtance. How they could have ſped well, in undertaking ſuch a match, it is uneaſie to find in diſcourſe of humane reaſon. It is true, that vertue and fortune work wonders; but it is againſt cowardly Fools, and the unfortunate: for whoſoever contends with one too mighty for him, either muſt excell in theſe, as much as his Enemy goes beyond him in power; or elſe muſt look, both to be overcome, and to be caſt down ſo much the lower, by how much the opinion of his Fortune and Vertue renders him ſuſpected, as likely to make head another time againſt the Vanquiſher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in thoſe days the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might, without partiality, deliver mine own Opinion, and prefer that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but alſo Alexander's Princes after him, in the greateſt dangers of all ſorts of War; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did ſend forth. Concerning Fortune, who can give a rule that ſhall always hold? Alexander was victorious in every Battel that he fought; and the Romans in the iſſue of every War. But foraſmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of conſideration; I think it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three years after his death, the two Roman Conſuls, together with all the power of that State, were ſurpriſed by the Samnites, and enforced to yield up their Arms. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander thoſe Captains of theirs, which were honoured ſufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the ſame conceit ſhould blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding ſuch a controverſie, methinks it were not amiſs, for an Engliſh-man, to give ſuch a ſentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being choſen Arbitrators) between the Ardeates and Aricini, that ſtrove about a piece of Land; ſaying, that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themſelves. Liv. Dec. 1. l. 3.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the beſt Warriour? I will anſwer, The Engliſh-men. For it will ſoon appear, to any that ſhall examine the noble acts of our Nation in War, that they were performed by no advantage of Weapon; againſt no ſavage or unmanly People; the Enemy being far ſuperiour unto us in numbers, and all needful Proviſions, yea, as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exerciſe of War.

In what ſort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece, what manner of men the Perſians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquiſhed; as likewiſe of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, againſt ſuch Arms as it commonly encountred; any man, that hath taken pains to read the fore-going ſtory of them, doth ſufficiently underſtand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very ſeldom, able to ſtand againſt the Roman Armies; which were embattelled in ſo excellent a form, as I know not, whether any Nation beſides them have uſed, either before or ſince. The Romans Weapons likewiſe, both offenſive and defenſive, were of greater uſe, than thoſe with which any other Nation hath ſerved, before the fiery inſtruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the Enemies, with which Rome had to do, we find, that they, which did over-match her in numbers, were as far over-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom ſhe had little advantage in Arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This alſo (as Plutarch well obſerveth) was a part of her happineſs; that ſhe was never over-lay'd with too great Wars at once.

Hereby it came to paſs, that having at firſt increaſed her ſtrength, by acceſſion of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, againſt which ſhe adventured her own ſelf, as it were in wager, upon the Heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her ſelf Princeſs of Latium; ſhe did afterwards, by long War, in many Ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-near oppreſſed her, but their Souldiers were Mercenary; ſo that for want of proper ſtrength, they were eaſily beaten at their own doors. The Ætolians, and with them all, or the moſt of Greece, aſſiſted her againſt Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat beat the same Ætolians. The Wars against Antiochus, and other Asiatiques, were such as gave to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the Lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicil, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands by using her aid, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not need to speak of her other Conquests; it was easie to get more when she had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman Valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous Victories; I am not so idle. This I say, that among all their Wars, I find not any, wherein their Valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my judgment seem over-partial, our Wars in France may help to make it good.

First therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the World besides) had never any so brave a Commander in War, as Julius Cæsar: and that no Roman Army was comparable unto that which served under the same Cæsar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which had given fair proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian War, when it first entred into Gaul, was nevertheless utterly disheartened, when Cæsar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæsar's men, to their long exercise under so good a Leader, in so great a War. Now let us in general, compare with the deeds done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principal Service; the things performed in the same Country, by our common English Souldier, levied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the Shop-stall; so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deal fairly, and believe Cæsar, in relating the Acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witness, what actions were performed by the English. In Cæsar's time, France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout People, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued, even when the Romans gave them assistance. The Country of Gaul was rent in sunder (as Cæsar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude; none ordered in such sort as might make it appliable to the nearest Neighbour. The Factions were many, and violent; not only in general through the whole Country, but between the petty States; yea, in every City, and almost in every House. What greater advantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater; Ariovistus, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in a subjection, little different from meer slavery: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in War upon the Gauls, that the Gauls (who had sometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equal to those daily invaders. Had France been so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome it self, by this time, and long ere this time, would have been ours. But when King Edward the Third began his War upon France, he found the whole Country settled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose Reputation abroad, was no less than his Puissance at home; under whose Ensign the King of Bohemia did serve in Person; at whose call, the Genoways, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take Arms: Finally, a King unto whom one [a] Prince gave away his Dominion for love; [b] another sold away a goodly City and Territory for Money. The Country lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meer vanity, to match the English purchases with the Roman Conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military vertue therein. Cæsar himself doth witness, that the Gauls complained of their own ignorance in the Art of War, and that their own hardiness was over-mastered by the skill of their Enemies. Poor men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of battery, raised and planted against their Walls, as more than humane works. What greater wonder is it, that such a People was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked People, but valiant as any under the Skie, are commonly put to the worse, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard, of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt Forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to pass, that they were never able to make use of Opportunity; but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellows, and sometimes driven to give or take Battel, upon extream disadvantages, for fear, lest their Companies should fall asunder: as indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break, and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little less than all this) great odds in Weapon, gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant Victories. What such help? or what other worldly help, than the golden metal of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of War? Yea, did they not think themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in Arms, in Horse, and in all Provision, exceedingly beyond us? Let us hear what a French Writer saith, of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set upon the Black Prince, at the Battel of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, both of number, force, shew, Country, and conceit (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affairs) and withall, the choice of all his Horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe*) with the greatest and wisest Captains of his whole Realm.* And what could he wish more?

John de Serres.

Jean avoit tout l'avantage par dessus Edouard, le numbre, la force, le lustre, le pays, le prejuge (qui n'est pas communement une consideration de peu d'importance aux affaires du monde) & avec soi l'elite de sa Cavallerie, lors estimee la meilleure de tout son Royaume.

I think, it would trouble a Roman Antiquary, to find the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought Prisoner to Rome, by an Army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with forty thousand, better appointed, and no less expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of half Scullions, as Livie rightly terms them; nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patterns. All that have read of Cressy and Agincourt, will bear me witness, that I do not alledge the Battel of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English vertue; the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than ever did the Valour of the Romans. If any man impute these Victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Cross-bow: my answer is ready; that in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong Arm) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a Weapon of more use. The Gun, and the Cross-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakness, or sickness, or a sore finger, makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custom of our Anceſtors, to ſhoot, for the moſt part, point blanck: and ſo ſhall he perceive that will note the circumſtances of almoſt any one Battel. This takes away all objection, for when two Armies are within the diſtance of a Butts length, one Flight of Arrows, or two at the moſt, can be delivered before they cloſe. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more ſtrongly than the Croſs-Bow; but this is the rare effect of an extraordinary Arm; whereupon can be grounded no common Rule. If any man ſhall ask, How then came it to paſs that the Engliſh wan ſo many great Battels, having no advantage to help him? I may, with beſt commendation of Modeſty, refer him to the French Hiſtorian: who relating the Victory of our Men at Crevant, where they paſſed a Bridge in face of the Enemy, uſeth theſe words; The Engliſh comes with a conquering Bravery, as he that was accuſtomed to gain every where, without any ſtay: he forceth our Guard placed upon the Bridge to keep the Paſſage. Or I may cite another place of the ſame Author, where he tells how the Britons being invaded by Charles the Eighth, King of France, thought it good policy to apparel a thouſand and two hundred of their own Men in Engliſh Caſſacks; hoping that the very ſight of the Engliſh red Croſs, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not ſtand to borrow of the French Hiſtorians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmylius, report Wonders of our Nation) the Propoſition which firſt I undertook to maintain; That the Military Vertue of the Engliſh, prevailing againſt all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was aſſiſted with all advantages that could be deſired. If it be demanded; Why then did not our Kings finiſh the Conqueſt, as Cæſar had done? my anſwer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the Race of the Æacidæ, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this Note; Belli potentes ſunt magè quam ſapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politick. Who ſo notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to work like a Conqueror: ſave only King Henry the Fifth, the courſe of whoſe Victories, it pleaſed God to interrupt by his Death. But this Queſtion is the more eaſily anſwered, if another be firſt made. Why did not the Romans attempt the Conqueſt of Gaul, before the time of Cæſar? Why not after the Macedonian War? Why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all theſe times they had good leiſure: and then eſpecially had they both leiſure, and fit opportunity, when under the Conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquiſhed the Cimbri, and Tutones, by whom the Country of Gaul had been piteouſly waſted. Surely, the words of Tully were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gauls for preſervation of their own ſafety.

John de Cewes.

Therefore they attempted not the Conqueſt of Gaul, until they were Lords of all other Countries to them known. We on the other ſide, held only the one half of our own Iſland; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unleſs perhaps in wealth and numbers of men ſomewhat inferiour) every way equal to our ſelves; a Nation, anciently and ſtrongly allied to our Enemies the French, and in that regard, Enemies to us. So that our danger lay both before and behind us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, always we feared, a ſtronger invaſion by Land, than we could make upon France, tranſporting our Forces over Sea.

It is uſual with men that have pleaſed themſelves, in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Hiſtories; to hold it a great injury done to their Judgment, if any take upon him, by way of compariſon, to extol the things of later Ages. But I am well perſwaded, that as the divided Vertue of this our Iſland, hath given more noble proof of it ſelf; than under ſo worthy a Leader, that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæſar a Monarch; ſo hereafter, by Gods bleſſing, who hath converted our greateſt hindrance into our greateſt help, the Enemy that ſhall dare to try our Forces, will find cauſe to wiſh, that avoiding us, he had rather encountred as great a puiſſance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aſide compariſons, we return to the rehearſal of deeds done: wherein we ſhall find how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to ſtrive with Carthage for Dominion, in the firſt Punick War.

§. II.

The Eſtate of Carthage, before it entred into War with Rome.

THe City of Carthage had ſtood above ſix hundred years, when firſt it began to contend with Rome for the Maſtery of Sicil. It forewent Rome one hundred and fifty years in antiquity of Foundation; but in the Honour of great Atchievments, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it ſelf, from the weſt part of Cyrene, to the Streights of Hercules, about one thouſand and five hundred miles in length, wherein ſtood three hundred Cities. It had ubjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenæan Mountains, together with all the Iſlands in the Mediterranian Sea, to the weſt of Scicil, and of Scicil the better part. It flouriſhed about ſeven hundred and thirty years, before the deſtruction thereof by Scipio: who beſides other Spoils, and all that the Souldiers reſerved, carried thence four hundred and ſeventy thouſand weight of Silver, which make of our Money (if our Pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thouſand pound Sterling. So as this glorious City ran the ſame Fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and ſince. The Ruine of the goodlieſt pieces of the World, fore-ſhews the diſſolution of the whole.

About one hundred years after ſuch time as it was caſt down, the Senate of Rome cauſed it to be rebuilt, and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Genſericus the Vandal, by Belliſarius under Juſtinian, by the Perſians, by the Ægyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The Seat thereof was exceeding ſtrong: and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compaſſed it about, ſaving that it was tyed to the Main by a neck of Land, which paſſage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian ſaith three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced to believe the common report, that the City it ſelf was above twenty mile in compaſs; if not that of Strabo, affirming the Circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three Walls without the Wall of the City, and between each of thoſe, three or four Streets with Vaults under ground of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants and all their Food. Over theſe they had Stables for four thouſand Horſe, and Granaries rles for all their Provender. They had also Lodging in these Streets between these out-walls for four thousand Horse-men, and twenty thousand Foot-men, which (according to the Discipline used now by those of China) never pestered the City. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa; to which Sirvius gives two and twenty furlongs in compass, that make two mile and a half. This was the same piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when she got leave to buy only so much Land of them, as she could compass with an Ox Hide. On the West side it had also the Salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing Pool; for a certain Arm of Land fastned to the ground on which the City stood, stretched it self toward the west Continent, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The Form of their common-wealth resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Aristocratical Power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the People in latter times usurped too great authority in their Councels. This confusion in Government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forceable causes of their Ruine, were their Avarice and their Cruelty. Their Avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary Tributes) the one [b] half of the Fruits of the Earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not upon gentle and merciful persons, but upon those who could best tyrannize over the People, to augment their Treasures. Their cruelty appeared in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance. The one of these rendred them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready, upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break the Spirits of their Generals, by presenting, in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruel Death at home. Hereby it came to pass, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian Forces, after some great loss received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their Charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repair their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own best Projects after that good form, wherein they first conceived them, for fear, lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him whose bad Counsel had prosperous event. The Faults, wherewith in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians I find to be these; Lust, Cruelty, Avarice, Craft, Unfaithfulness, and Perjury.

[b] The Turks at this day, do also take the one half of the poor mans Corn, that labours the Earth; yea, they take Tribute both of the Bodies and of the Souls of the Christians their Vassals, by bereaving them of their ablest Children, and bringing them up in the Mahometan Religion. The Irish take the fourth Sheaf; and were wont to eat up with their Horse-men, Foot-men, and Dogs, what they pleased of the other three parts remaining. The Husbandman and the Yeoman of England are the freest of all the World: And reason good; for of them have the Bodies of our victorious Armies been compounded. And it is the Freeman, and not the Slave that hath Courage, and the sense of shame deserved by Cowardise.

How free the English Yeomen have been, in times not long since past, Fortescue hath shewed in his Praise of our Country Laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than ever, and our Nobility and Gentry more servile. For since the excessive Bravery, and vain Expence of our Grandees, hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by Inclosures, and dismembring of Mannors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentry of England have been dissolved, the Tenants having paid unto their Lords their Rack-Rent, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little Love.

Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same Crimes, let the tryal be referred unto their actions. The first League between Carthage and Rome was very ancient: having been made the year following the Expulsion of Tarquin. In that League, the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have Trade in some part of Africk, nor suffer any Ship of theirs to pass beyond the Head-land, or Cape, then called the fair Promontory, unless it were by force of Tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second League was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased * Livie to say, that the Romans granted it at the Carthaginians intreaty) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have Trade in any part of Africa, or in the Island of Sardinia.

By these two Treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent, not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other People) from getting any knowledge of the State of Africk; but to countenance and uphold them in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicil, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian Succours. Hereupon we find good cause of the Joy that was in Carthage, and the Crown of Gold weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrown. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italy, than the great Power of Carthage did in Sicil. For that mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicil, was consumed by Pestilence; many great Fleets were devoured by Tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own Valour, or by assistance of their good Friends out of Greece, did at some other time repair their own losses, and take revenge upon these Invadors. But never were the People of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicil, than when the Death of Agathocles the Tyrant had left the whole Island in combustion; the Estate of Greece being such at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busie in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their Fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp War upon the Romans. These News were unpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtil Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicil, as soon as he could finish his Roman War. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome, who declared in their Name, that they were sorry to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good Friends in this War, with Pyrrhus; and that the People of Carthage were very willing to assist the State of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needful against the Epirots.

It was indeed, the main desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his Work in Italy, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicil, which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded, and refused to accept any such aid of their Friends, lest it should blemish their Reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own ſtrength. Yet the Meſſage was taken lovingly, as it ought, and the former League between Rome and Carthage renewed, with Covenants added, concerning the preſent buſineſs; That if either of the two Cities made Peace with Pyrrhus, it ſhould be, with reſervation of Liberty to aſſiſt the other, in caſe that Pyrrhus ſhould invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithſtanding, and notwithſtanding that the ſame Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, uſing all means to ſound his intentions (a matter very difficult where one upon every new occaſion changeth his own purpoſes) yet Pyrrhus found leiſure to make a ſtep into Sicil, where, though in fine, he was neither getter nor ſaver, yet he clean defeated the purpoſes of Carthage, leaving them at his departure thence, as far from any end, as when they firſt began.

So many diſaſters in an enterpriſe, that from the firſt undertaking, had been ſo ſtrongly purſued through the length of many Generations might well have induced the Carthaginians to believe, that an higher providence reſiſted their intendment. But their deſire of winning that fruitful Iſland, was ſo inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they ſtill continued in hope of ſo much the greater Harveſt, by how much their coſt and pains therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courſes; and by force or practiſe, recovered in few years all their old Poſſeſſions: making Peace with Syracuſe, the chief City of the Iſland, that ſo they might the better enable themſelves to deal with the reſt.

Somewhat before this time, a Troop of Campanian Souldiers, that had ſerved under Agathocles, being entertained within Meſſena as Friends, and finding themſelves too ſtrong for the Citizens, took advantage of the Power that they had to do wrong, and with perfidious cruelty, ſlew thoſe that truſted them, which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of thoſe whom they had murdered. Theſe Mercenaries called themſelves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were, and like enough it is, that meer deſperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous Treachery, added Rage unto their Stoutneſs. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the Law of the Stronger, they over-ran the Countrey round about them.

In this courſe, at firſt they ſped ſo well, that they did not only defend Meſſena againſt the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, againſt the Syracuſians, and others, but they rather wan upon them, yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting Tribute from many neighbour places. But it was not long ere Fortune turning her Back to theſe Mamertines, the Syracuſians wan faſt upon them, and finally confining them within the Walls of Meſſena, they alſo with a powerful Army beſieged the City. It hapned ill, that about the ſame time a contention began, between the Syracuſian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuſe, and Governours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded ſo far, that the Army elected two Governours among themſelves; to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many Vertues, although it was contrary to the Policy of that State, to approve any Election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great Clemency he uſed at his firſt entrance, was by general conſent, eſtabliſhed and made Governour. This Office he rather uſed as a Scale, thereby to climb to ſome higher degree, than reſted content with his preſent Preferment.

In brief, there was ſomewhat wanting, whereby to ſtrengthen himſelf within the City, and ſomewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and ſafe keeping of the Place he ſought; to wit, a powerful Party within the Town, and certain mutinous Troops of Souldiers without, often and eaſily moved to Sedition and Tumult. For the firſt, whereby to ſtrengthen himſelf, he took to Wife the Daughter of Leptines, a man of the greateſt Eſtimation and Authority among the Syracuſians. For the ſecond, leading out the Army to beſiege Meſſena, he quartered all thoſe Companies which he held ſuſpected, on the one ſide of the City, and leading the reſt of his Horſe and Foot unto the other ſide, as if he would have aſſaulted it in two ſeveral parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town Walls, and left the Mutiniers to be cut in pieces by the Aſſieged: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he haſted again towards Meſſena, and was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former Victory over the Mutiniers) incountred in the Plains of Mylæum, where he obtained a moſt ſignal Victory, and leading with him their Commander Captive into Syracuſe, himſelf by common conſent was elected and ſaluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines finding themſelves utterly infeebled, ſome of them reſolved to give themſelves to the Carthaginians, others to crave aſſiſtance of the Romans: to each of whom, the ſeveral Factions, diſpatched Embaſſadors for the ſame purpoſe.

The Carthaginians were ſoon ready to lay hold upon the good Offer: ſo that a Captain of theirs got into the Caſtle of Meſſena, whereof they that had ſent for him gave him poſſeſſion. But within a little while, they that were more inclineable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to ſo good agreement, that this Captain, either by force or by cunning, was turned out of doors, and the Town reſerved for other Maſters.

Theſe News did much offend the People of Carthage; who crucified their Captain, as both a Traitor and Coward; and ſent a Fleet and Army to beſiege Meſſena, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron, the new made King of Syracuſe (to gratifie his People, incenſed with the ſmart of Injuries lately received) added his Forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a League, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all ſides were cloſed up within Meſſena, the Carthagians lying with a Navy at Sea, and with an Army on the one ſide of the Town, whileſt Hieron with his Syracuſians, lay before it on the other ſide.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius, the Roman Conſul, with an Army to the Streights of Sicil: which paſſing by night with notable audacity, he put himſelf into the Town, and ſending Meſſengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hiero, required them to depart; ſignifying unto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the People of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reaſon would not prevail.

This Meſſage was utterly neglected; And ſo began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to ſhew, on which part was the juſtice of the Quarrel, when ſome actions actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick War. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

WHen Pyrrhus began his Wars in Italy, the City of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busie time, sought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of four thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect, by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the Fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatness of the Booty, than the odiousness of the Villainy by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like Purchace, by taking the like wicked Course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and People of Rome, of this Outrage, they finding their Honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the World made a more severe Profession of Justice than they did, during all the time of their growing Greatness) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the Offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the Fires kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their Fact, hopeless of Pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution, yet in the end, the Assailants forced them, and those which escaped the present Fury, were brought bound to Rome, where after the usual Torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custom of the Country, they had their Heads stricken from their Shoulders; and the People of Rhegium were again restored to their former Liberties and Estates.

This Execution of Justice being newly performed, and the Fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italy: Messengers came to Rome from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians and Syracusians, that were in a readiness to inflict the like Punishment upon the Mamertines, for the like Offence. An impudent Request it was, which they made: who having both given example of that Villainy to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt Forces to make it good; intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their Fellow Thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve whether the way of Honesty or of Profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was, to their former Counsels and Actions, seeing for the same Offences they had lately put to Torment and to the Sword their own Souldiers, and restored the Oppressed to their Liberty. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best parts of Africa, of the Mediterranean Islands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil it self; whilest also they feared, that Syracuse therein seated (a City in Beauty and Riches, little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and far superiour to Rome it self) might become theirs; the safety of their own Estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver up Messana, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage, and the Lordship of all Sicil: for Syracuse it self could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that Passage from the main Land. It was further considered, that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not only debar all succours out of the Continent, from arrival in Sicil; but would serve as a Bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers that threatned from afar, did so prevail, above all regard of Honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatcht away for Messana: into which he entred, and undertook the protection of it, as is shewed before. The Besiegers were little troubled with his arrival; and less moved with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their Wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this, he thought the stiff metal of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the Field, and to let the Enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the Enemy lay incamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous Followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own Quarter, without help of others. Against him Appius Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected sally, to surprize his Trenches) arranged his men in order of battel, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely, he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazarded all his Power against an Enemy, of whom he had made no tryal; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get Honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his Raign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his Trenches: by which loss he learned a point of Wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his Life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie in helping those of Carthage against the Mamertines.

Had Messana been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it self must have sought help from Rome, against those Friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a ſmall ſtock, which it behooved him to govern well: ſuch another loſs would have made him almoſt bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them ſtand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he ſped ſo well, that the Enemy forſook both Field and Camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having ſpoiled all round, without reſiſtance, intended to lay ſiege unto the great City of Syracuſe.

Theſe proſperous beginnings, howſoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at firſt they had expected. Yet did they not imprint any form of terror in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater loſſes than this; in which no more was loſt, than what had been prepared againſt the Mamertines alone, without any ſuſpicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it ſeaſonable to conſider of thoſe grounds whereupon the Romans entred into this War; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honeſty (for queſtionleſs the enterpriſe was much to their benefit, though as much to their ſhame) but how allowable in ſtrict terms of lawfulneſs, whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yield themſelves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diſtreſſed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot find, neither can I find how the meſſengers of thoſe Folk, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any ſuch ſurrendry, in the publick Name of all their Company.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawful ſurrendry of themſelves and their Poſſeſſions, were become ſubject unto Rome, by what better Title could the Romans aſſiſt the Mamertines againſt their moſt ancient Friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes againſt the Samnites, without the ſame condition? which was (as they themſelves confeſſed) by none at all. But let it be ſuppoſed, that ſome point ſerving to clear this doubt, is loſt in all Hiſtories. Doubtleſs it is, that no company of Pirates, Thieves, Out-laws, Murtherers, or ſuch other Malefactors, can, by any good ſucceſs of their Villany, obtain the priviledge of civil Societies, to make League or Truce, yea, or to require fair War: but are by all means, as moſt pernicious Vermine, to be rooted out of the World. I will not take upon me to maintain that Opinion of ſome Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his Faith with one of theſe; it were a Poſition of ill conſequence: This I hold, that no one Prince or State can give protection to ſuch as theſe, as long as any other is uſing the Sword of Vengeance againſt them, without becoming acceſſary to their Crimes. Wherefore we may eſteem this action of the Romans, ſo far from being juſtifiable, by any pretence of Confederacy made with them; as that contrariwiſe, by admitting this Neſt of Murtherers and Thieves into their Protection, they juſtly deſerved to be warred upon themſelves by the People of Sicil; yea, although Meſſana had been taken, and the Mamertines all ſlain, ere any News of this Confederacy had been brought unto the Beſiegers. The great Alexander was ſo far perſwaded herein; that he did put to Sword all the Branchiadæ (a People in Sogdiana) and razed their City, notwithſtanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; becauſe they were deſcended from a Company of Mileſians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Country, which theſe of their Poſterity enjoyed. Nevertheleſs, in courſe of humane Juſtice, long and peaceable poſſeſſion gives jus acquiſitum, a kind of Right by preſcription, unto that which was at firſt obtained by wicked means: and doth free the Deſcendants from the Crime of their Anceſtors, whoſe Villanies they do not exerciſe. But that the ſame Generation of Thieves, which by a deteſtable Fact hath purchaſed a rich Town, ſhould be acknowledged a lawful Company of Citizens, there is no ſhew of Right. For even the Conqueror, that by open War obtaineth a Kingdom, doth not confirm his Title by thoſe Victories which gave him firſt poſſeſſion; but length of time is requiſite to eſtabliſh him, unleſs by ſome alliance with the Ancient Inheritors, he can better the violence of his Claim, as did our King Henry the firſt, by his Marriage with Maud, that was Daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Niece of Edmond Ironſide. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had ſo good) of Juſtice in this quarrel, than had the Goths, Hunns, Vandals, and other Nations of the Wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her ſelf, in the time of her Viſitation, was burnt to the ground.

§. IV.

Of the Iſland of Sicil.

† I.

The Quality of the Iſland: and the firſt Inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the poſſeſſion of Meſſana, being now no longer, ſince the firſt Victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like caſes we have obſerved, to make a brief Collection of things concerning that noble Iſland, which hath been the Stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this preſent War.

That Sicil was ſometimes a Peninſula, or Demy Iſle, adjoyned to Italy, as a part of Brutium in Calabria near unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempeſt ſevered from the ſame: it is a general opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this diviſion happened, there is no memorial remaining in any ancient Writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionyſius affirm, that it was cauſed by an Earth-quake; Silius, and Caſſiodorus, do think it to have been done by the rage and violence of the Tide and Surges of the Sea. Either of theſe Opinions may be true; for ſo was Eubœa ſevered from Bœotia; Atalante and Macris from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Britain it ſelf (as may ſeem by Verſtegans arguments) from the oppoſite Continent of Gaul. But for Sicil, they which lend their ears to Fables, do attribute the cauſe of it to Neptune (as Euſtathius witneſſeth) who with his three forked Mace, in favour of Focaſtus, the Son of Æolus, divided it from the main land, and ſo made it an Iſland

Island, which before was but a Demy Isle, that by that means he might the more safely inhabit and possess the same. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sundring it from Italy, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the Rocks and Mountains) first opened the Sicilian Streights, as Hercules did those of Gibralter.

Orion. l. 4. c. 14. Diod. l. 6. Ovid. de Fast. 4.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantity and content, do make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirm this, not only to excel the rest for bigness, but also for goodness of Soil. As concerning the form of this Island, Pomponius Mela, saith, it is like that Capital Letter of the Greeks which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the Figure of a Triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old Writers with one consent affirm. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corn: to Proserpina, not so much, for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as soon as she, uncovering her self, first shewed her self to be seen of him, gave her the Dominion thereof.

Of the Fertility and Riches of this Country, there is a famous Testimony written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granary, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth add in that place; that it was not only the Store-house of the People of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished Treasury. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath usually cloathed, maintained, and furnished our greatest Armies with Leather, Apparel, and Corn. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoever Sicily doth yield (saith Solinus) whether by the Sun and temperature of the Air, or by the industry and labour of Man, it is accounted next unto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the Earth first putteth forth, are extreamly overgrown with Saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the Fields near unto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Island, Wheat doth grow of it self, without any labour or looking to of the Husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it six Colonies, and sixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the Names are found scatteringly in many good Authors.

Strab. l. 6.

Now besides many famous acts done by the People of this Island, as well in Peace as War; there be many other things which have made it very renowned, as the Birth of Ceres; the ravishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the Mount Ætna, Scylla and Charibdis, with other Antiquities and Rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes; the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painful Historian Diodorus, and Epidocles the deep Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Læstrigones, and Cyclopes, barbarous People, and uncivil; all Histories and Fables do joyntly with one consent aver. Yet Thucydides saith, that these savage People dwelt only in one part of the Island. Afterward the Sicani, a People of Spain possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some do so think) Thucydides and Diodorus do constantly avouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterwards built, were driven by the Pelasgi from their own Seats, and finding no place upon the Continent, which they were able to master and inhabit, passed over into this Island three hundred years before the Greeks sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eighty years before the Fall of Troy. These Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Island; and making War upon the Sicani, drave them from the East and Northern part thereof into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the City Zancle, afterward called Messena; and after that Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse it self, beating from thence the Ætolians, who long before had set up a Town in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not known, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) won that part of the Island from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrival dispossess the Ætolians thereof, but some hundred years after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Neæ, Hybla, Trinacia, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate down in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a Civil War greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we find the last Voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Historian of unquestionable sincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Islands: and some such business, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dædalus. The Tale goes thus: Dædalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, near unto Megara, for Cocalus to lay up his Treasure in; together with many notable Works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ram in Gold, that was set up in the Temple of Venus Eurysina; which he did with so great art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living, than counterfeit.

Now Minos hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own strength, promiseth to deliver Dædalus. This he performs not, but in the mean while kills Minos by Treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his Followers, to inhabit a part of Sicil; the better (as it seems) to strengthen himself against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their consent, and builded for themselves the City of Minoa, after the Name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Town of Engyum, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two Ages before the War of Troy; for the Grand-children of Minos served with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by Treason been made away; they gathered together a great Army to invade Cocalus: and landing near unto Camicus, they besieged the same five years, but in vain. In the end (being forced to return without any revenge taken) they were wrackt on the Coast of Italy; and having no means to repair their Ships, nor the Honour they had lost, they made good the Place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between tween the two famous Ports of Brundusium and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those nations, afterward called Iapyges, and Messapij.

After the taking of Troy, Ægestus and Elymus brought with them certain Troops into Sicil, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Ægesta and Elyma.

It is said that Æneas visited these places in his passage into Italy: and that some of the Trojans, his Followers, were left behind him in these Towns of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Æneas himself the Founder.

About the same time, the Phœnicians seized upon the Promontories of Pachinus and Lilybæum, and upon certain small Isles adjoyning to the main Island: which they fortified, to secure the Trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East-India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambique, and other places. But the Phœnicians stayed not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly City of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we find were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the War of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seem strange to the Reader, that in all ancient Stories he finds one and the same beginning of Nations after the Flood; and that the first Planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Ægypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmark had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moses make us know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountains and Desarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the Races of Giants: and were it not that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Pliny, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors have confirmed the Opinion. Yea, Vesputius, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported, that himself hath seen the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the self same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicity of Life, their mean Fare, their feeding on Acorns and Roots, their poor Cottages, the covering of their Bodies with the Skins of Beasts, their Hunting, their Arms and Weapons, and their Warfare, their first passages over great Rivers and Arms of the Sea upon Rafts of Trees tied together; and afterward, their making Boats, first, of Twigs and Leather, then of Wood; first, with Oars, and then with Sail; that they esteemed as Gods the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandry, of Laws, and of Policy: it is a matter that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newness of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrews, who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they began, by time and degrees to find out the causes: from whence came Philosophy natural; as the Moral did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression.

But it is certain, that the Age of Time hath brought forth strange and more incredible things than the Infancy. For we have now greater Giants for Vice and injustice than the World had in those days for bodily strength; for Cottages and Houses of Clay and Timber, we have raised Palaces of Stone; we carve them, we paint them, and adorn them with Gold; insomuch, as men are rather known by their Houses, than their Houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes to two hundred; from Water, to Wine and Drunkenness; from the covering of our Bodies with the Skins of Beasts, not only to Silk and Gold, but to the very Skins of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excess which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque auxit, longissima subruet; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time longer than the rest shall overthrow it.

The Plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

WHen the first Inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened that one Theocles, a Greek, being driven upon that Coast by an Easterly Wind; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets; gave information to the Athenians of this his discovery, and proposed unto them the benefit of this easie Conquest, offering to become their Guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himself in perswading the noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needy and industrious, by whom his Project was gladly entertained. By these was built the City of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our Western Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupy the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, near unto that City, called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part only was then compassed with a Wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nasos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country; and after a few years, their Multitudes increasing, they added unto the City of the Island, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many Ships as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the Soil; Syracuse grew up in great haste to be one of the goodliest Towns of the World. In short time the Greeks did possess the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Island, making their Royal Residence in Trinacia.

* Syracuse as Cicero relates, was the greatest and most goodly City of all that the Greeks possest. For the situation is both strong and of an excellent prospect, from every entrance by Land or Sea. The Port was (for the most part) environed with beautiful building: and that part which was without the City, was on both sides bankt up, and sustained with beautiful Walls of Marble. The City it self was one of the greatest of the World: for it had in compass (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble Wall thereof, 180 Furlongs; which made of our Miles about 18. It was compounded of four Cities (Strabo saith of five) to wit, Insula, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatness, the Ruines and Foundations of the Walls do yet witness.

Some

After such time as the Dores of Peloponnesus had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly City, for a long time became the Seat of Tyrants. The first whereof was Gelo; The second, Hiero, the elder; The third, Thrasybulus; The fourth and fifth, Dionysius the elder and younger; The sixth, Dion; The seventh, Agathocles; The eighth Pyrrhus; The ninth, Hiero the younger; The tenth and last, Hieronimus: who being slain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

Some seven years after the arrival of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the success of the Corinthians, did assail and obtain the City of Leontium, built and possessed by the Siculi. In brief, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that forc'd it, they called Megara.

About five and forty years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned City of Agrigentum, governed according to the Laws of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their Plantation, did set up the City of Acra, in the Mountains; and in the ninetieth year Casmena, in the Plains adjoyning; and again, in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina; and soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Island. So did the Cumani, about the same time, recover from the Siculi the City of Zancle, which they had founded in the Streight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle had been Founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorieus the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia; which the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the same were again ere long re-edified.

Selirius also was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their own Country, gave the Name thereof unto this their new Purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Island.

†. II.

Of the Government and Affairs of Sicil, before Dionysius his Tyranny.

THe most part of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the Rule of the People, till such time as Phalaris began to usurp the State of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of Tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of Brass, wherein to enclose men, and scorch them to death: praising the Device with this Commendation; That the Noise of one tormented therein, should be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Inventor, by causing the first tryal to be made upon himself. He raigned one and thirty years, saith Eusebius; others give him but sixteen: However it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno to make him confess some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their Liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the Government of the Common-weal: at which time also Panætius made himself Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, having ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his Brother Hippocrates succeeded in his room, and greatly afflicted the People of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers other of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made War with the Syracusians, and in the end, got from them, by composition, the City of Camerina. But when he had raigned seven years, he was slain in a Battel against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their form of Government, from Popular to Aristocratical; a preparation towards a Principality, whereinto it was soon after changed. After the Death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the Forces of Hippocrates, in the former War, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters Death, breaking the Trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his Children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, between the Magistrates and the People. For coming with a strong Army to the succour of the Governours, driven out by the Multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change happened in the second year of the threescore and twelfth Olimpiad; wherein the better to establish himself, he took to Wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the State of Agrigentum. Pausan. l. 6.

Now this Gelon, the Son of Dinomenes, had three Brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus: to the first of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians, who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moved a War against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought to Syracuse; and the People he sold for Slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossest Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrel by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon also was solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrown by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil. Herod. & Diod.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Army past the Hellespont. He, for their relief having armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred Ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the Commandment of one of their Armies, either by Sea or by Land. So he used to their Embassadors only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greek Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great loss received, fearing the invasion of their own Countrey, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace: who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their Children to Saturn; That they should pay him two thousand Talents of Silver; and present him with two armed Ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand Talents, and the Ships for War, War, they ſent unto Demarata, Gelon's Wife, a Crown, valued at an hundred Talents of Gold, with other Preſents. Whereby we ſee that ſome Nations and ſome Natures are much the better for being well beaten. The Wars ended, and Sicil in Peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Succeſſor his Brother Hiero. Philiſtus and Pliny report, That when his Body was burnt, according to the cuſtom of that Age, a Dog of his, which always waited on him, ran into the Fire, and ſuffered himſelf to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his Brother ſucceeded; a man rude, cruel, covetous, and ſo ſuſpicious of his Brethren Polyzelus and Thraſybulus, as he ſought by all means to deſtroy them. Notwithſtanding all this; by the converſation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the ſtudy of good Arts. Divers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he ſhortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the Succours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Græcians againſt him. He alſo overthrew in Battel, Thraſydæus the Son of Theron, and thereby reſtored the Agrigentines to their former Liberty. But in the end he loſt the Love of the Syracuſians; and after he had raigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his Brother Thraſybulus, who became a moſt unjuſt and bloody Tyrant. Thraſybulus enjoyed his Principality no longer than ten months. For notwithſtanding the force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his Guards, he was beaten out of Syracuſe by the Citizens; to whom, being beſieged in Acradina, he reſtored the Government, and was baniſhed the Iſland. From thence he ſailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracuſians recovered again their former Liberty, as all the reſt of the Cities did, after which they had never ſought, had the Succeſſors of Gelon inherited his Vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuſe. For in all changes of Eſtates, the preſervation ought to anſwer the acquiſition. Where a liberal, valiant, and adviſed Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himſelf from being a private man, to the Dignity of a Prince; it behoveth the Succeſſor to maintain it by the ſame way and art by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuſe (though not without blows, ere ſhe could cleanſe her ſelf of the Creatures and Lovers of Gelon) was now again become Miſtreſs of her ſelf, and held her ſelf free well near threeſcore years, to the time of Dionyſius; though ſhe were in the mean while greatly indangered by a Citizen of her own called Tyndario.

Now, to prevent the greatneſs of any one among them, for the future, they deviſed a kind of baniſhment of ſuch among them as were ſuſpected; taking pattern from the Athenian Oſtraciſm. They called this their new deviſed Judgment of exile, Petaliſmus, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive Leaf (as at Athens they wrote upon Shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had moſt ſuffrages againſt him, was baniſhed for five years. Hereby, in a ſhort time it came to paſs, that thoſe of Judgment, and beſt able to govern the Common-wealth, were by the worſt able, either ſuppreſt or thruſt out of the City. Yea, ſuch as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themſelves as ſecretly as they could; ſeeking ſome place of more ſecurity, wherein to maintain themſelves. And good reaſon they had ſo to do; ſeeing there is nothing ſo terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized Ignorance. But this Law laſted not long. For their neceſſity taught them to aboliſh it, and reſtore again the wiſer ſort to the Government; from which, the Nobility having practiſed to baniſh one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iſland (who had already taken Enna, and ſome other of the Græcian Cities, and overthrown the Army of the Agregentines) the Syracuſians ſent Forces againſt him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captain made nothing ſo much haſte to find Ducetius, againſt whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as ſoon as Ducetius preſented him Battel. So, for want of conduct, the greateſt number of the Syracuſians periſhed.

But making better choice among thoſe whom they had baniſhed, they levy other Troops: by whom, in concluſion, Ducetius being beaten, ſubmitteth himſelf, and is conſtrained to leave the Iſland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-ſide.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a ſort acknowledge Syracuſe: Trinacia excepted; which alſo by force of Arms, in the fourſcore and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reaſon.

But they do not long enjoy this their ſuperintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, ſeek aid from the Athenians, about the ſixth year of the Peloponneſian War. In this Suit they prevailed by the Eloquence of Gorgias their Orator, and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to ſuccour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charœades. To this Fleet the Leontines and their Partners added one hundred more; with which Forces, and with ſome Supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracuſians, and their Partiſans; wan and loſt divers places; took Meſſena; and in the ſeventh year of the Peloponneſian War, loſt it again. They alſo, at the ſame time, attempted Himera, but in vain. The Fire of this Quarrel took hold upon many Cities, which invaded each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themſelves on all hands, and yet could ſee no iſſue of the War; the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracuſians, and were admitted into their Society with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themſelves in Sicil, by the diviſion and civil War, were diſappointed of their Expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cuſtom of popular Eſtates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they baniſhed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heavy Fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the moſt memorable War that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians againſt the Selinuntines and Syracuſians, in favour of the Cities of Egeſta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppreſt the Egeſtans; and they of Syracuſe the

Leontines,

Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old Friends: And in hatred of the Athenians, Aid from Lacedæmon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, having none other end than that which they pretended, namely, to help a People of their own Tribe, that craved their succour, being in distress. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other than the Conquest of the whole Island. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their own passions, that they would not believe their own eyes, which presented unto them a Fleet and Army far greater than the terrible report of Fame had made it.

In this Expedition, the City of Athens had ingaged all her Power; as regarding, not only the greatness of the Enterprise, but the necessity of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of Peace with Athens, as differed not much from open War. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare no cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it, which was likely to be hindred by Wars at Home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians been over-passionate, the Arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstain from so chargeable a business, and to reserve their Forces for a more needful use. But young Counsels prevailed against the Authority of ancient men, that were more regardful of Safety than of Honour.

Of this business, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponnesian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the Affairs of Greece, otherwise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the People to this great Voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succor the Segestans, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians, as also by force of Arms, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicil, and compel them by Tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supream Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captains were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty Ships of Burden, which transported their Victuals, Engines, and other Munitions for the War: and these were Athenians, Mantinæans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were besides these, six thousand Megarians light armed, with thirty Horse-men.

Thucyd. l. 6. c. 9.

With these Troops and Fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entry; but sell them Victuals for their Money. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what Treasure they would contribute towards the War, seeing, for their sakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their Answers, that these Egestans were poor, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shews of Gold, having in all but thirty Talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient Friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what Disbursments the Egestans could make; and so to return again into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needless War. Alcibiades on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicil to Confederacy against the Syracusians, and Selinuntines, whereby to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he perswades them to assail Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Catana: and there they take new Counsel how to proceed. Thence they imployed Nicias to those of Egesta, who received from them thirty Talents towards his Charges; and one hundred and twenty Talents more there were of the Spoils they had gotten in the Island. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to to assail Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer, and the Army was left to the Conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtain a landing place very near unto Syracuse, by this device.

They imploy to Syracuse an Inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him to promise unto the Syracusians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best Forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians setting sail for Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at fair ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this they fight, and the Syracusians had the Loss; but the Athenians wanting Horse, could not pursue their Victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves with a resolution to refresh their Army at Catana, for the Winter-season. From thence they made an attempt upon Messena, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messenians. This he now did, in despight of his own Citizens the Athenians, because they had recalled him from his Command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured by his Friends, he took his way towards the Lacedæmonians, and to them he gave mischievous Counsel against his Country. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracusians sent Embassadors to Lacedæmon and Corinth for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicil, send to Athens for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian War) the Athenians in Sicil, sail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Country, they obtain some small Victories over the straggling Syracusians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at arms, but without Horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island, from the Segestans, and other their Adherents: they were also strengthened with a Company of Archers, and with three hundred Talents in Money.

Hereupon they took courage, and incamp near Syracuse, upon the Banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians that sallied to impeach their Intrenchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred Horse-men, with two hundred other Horſe, to mount their men at Arms. Syracuſe was now in effect blockt up, ſo as hardly any ſuccours could enter, but ſuch as were able to force their Paſſage: yet the Athenians receive divers loſſes; among which it was not the leaſt, that Lamachus, one of their beſt Cammanders was ſlain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Python, with the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian forces arrive, and take land at Himera. The Citizens of Himera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyn with them, ſo that with theſe and his own Troops, Gylippus adventured to march over land towards Syracuſe. The Syracuſians ſend a part of their Forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival near unto the City, upon a place of advantage. At the firſt encounter they had the better of their Enemies, by reaſon that the Syracuſian Horſe-men could not come to fight in thoſe Streights: but ſoon after, Gylippus charging them again, brake them, and conſtrained Nicias to fortifie himſelf within his Camp. Whereupon Nicias, made the ſtate of his Affairs known by his Letters to the Athenians; ſhewing, that without great Supplies by Sea and Land, the enterpriſe would be loſt, together with the ſmall Army remaining. Theſe Letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon, and Demoſthenes, to joyn with Nicias: the one they diſpatch preſently with ſome ſupply; the other they ſend after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while Gylippus at Syracuſe fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, ſometimes with ill, and at other times with good ſucceſs: but in concluſion, he took from them their Fort near unto Syracuſe, at the Promontory called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians loſt their Treaſure, and a great part of all their Proviſions. Notwithſtanding which loſs, and that the Athenians themſelves, in Greece, were (in effect) beſieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they moſt obſtinate in proſecuting the War in Sicil, and diſpatched away Demoſthenes with new Succours. Demoſthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian with his Fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicil; the one to ſuccour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loſs between them was in effect equal; and neither ſo broken, but that each of them proſecuted the Enterpriſe they had in hand. But before the Succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariſton had aſſailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuſe, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worſt, to the great diſcouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demoſthenes arrived with threeſcore and thirteen Gallies, charged with Foot-men; and (blaming the ſloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracuſians the ſame day that he arrived. But he made more haſte than he had good ſpeed, being ſhamefully beaten and repulſed with great loſs. Hereupon Demoſthenes and Eurymedon, determine to riſe up from before Syracuſe, and return to the ſuccour of Athens: but Nicias diſputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good Intelligence within Syracuſe, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatſoever Nicias his Intelligence was, upon the arrival of a new ſupply into the Town, the Athenians had all conſented to depart, and to lodg at Catana: had not an Eclipſe of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill ſucceſs, cauſed them to defer their departure. But this ſuperſtition coſt them dear. For the Syracuſians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with threeſcore and ſeventeen ſail of Gallies entred the great Port of Syracuſe, wherein the Athenians kept their Fleet, and whereon they had fortified themſelves. The Athenians, in the ſame Port, encountred them with fourſcore and ſix Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian Fleet was beaten by the leſſer number, and Eurymedon ſlain. Now, though it were ſo, that the Syracuſians received the more loſs by Land (for the Fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kind they thought themſelves invincible, they were wonderfully caſt down. For it was well ſaid of Gylippus, to the Syracuſians; When any People do find themſelves vanquiſhed in that manner of fight, and with thoſe Weapons in which they perſwade themſelves that they exceed all others, they not only loſe their Reputation, but their Courage. The Athenians, beſides the Gallies ſunk and wrackt, had ſeventeen taken and poſſeſt by the Enemy: and with great labour and loſs they defended the reſt from being fired, having drawn them within a Paliſado, in one corner of the Port, unadviſedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thruſt Ships into a ſtreight room and corner, as it is to ſcatter Foot in a plain Field againſt Horſe; the one ſubſiſting, by being at large; the other, by cloſe imbattailing.

The Syracuſians having now weakned the Athenian Fleet, reſolve to impriſon them within the Port. And to that purpoſe they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Veſſels, which they man moſt ſtrongly, becauſe the Athenians, being now made deſperate, ſhould not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracuſian Fleet; which lay but ſingle, becauſe they were forc'd to range themſelves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themſelves ſtrongly by their Anchors, but chained the ſides of their Gallies together, and laid behind them again certain Ships, which ſerved in the former War for Victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were ſunk, or the Chain which joyned them to their Fellows broken, the Athenians might yet find themſelves a ſecond time intangled and arreſted. To diſorder alſo thoſe Athenian Gallies which came on in form of a Wedge, to break through and force a paſſage, the Syracuſians had left within theſe Gallies and Ships inchained together, a certain number of looſe ones, to ſtop their courſe and fury. For where the way of any Veſſel uſing Oar or Sails is broken, and their ſpeed fore-ſlowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence the reſiſtance oppoſing.

On the other ſide, the Athenians knew that they were utterly loſt, except with an invincible reſolution, they could make their way, and break down this great Bridge of Boats; or (at leaſt) force a paſſage through them in ſome part or other: which they reſolve to hazard, with all their Shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the Bridge of Boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian Fleet, ere they came to force the Bridge, as, albeit ſome few of them had broken through the Chains, yet being ſtopt by the Ships without, and aſſailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracuſians, which were purpoſely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or ſunk. Three great diſadvantages the Athenians had: the firſt, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a ſtreight, they had no room to turn themſelves, nor to free themſelves one from another, being intangled; the ſecond, that having over-peſtered their Gallies with Souldiers, who uſed offenſive Arms of Darts and Slings, they had not place upon the Decks to ſtretch their arms; the third was, the diſcomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paſſage, by which they might ſave themſelves by running away. To be ſhort, the Fight was no leſs terrible than the Confuſion; the Slaughter great on all ſides; and the Noiſe and the Cries ſo loud and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as ſurvived, were beaten back to the Land, with loſs of threeſcore of their Gallies, broken, ſunk, or abandoned. The Syracuſians did alſo loſe twenty of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The reſt of the Athenian Gallies running themſelves into the bottom of the Port, ſaved themſelves by the help and contenance of the Land-army, there fortified. In this deſperate eſtate, the Athenian Commanders go to Counſel. Demoſthenes perſwades them to furniſh with freſh Souldiers thoſe few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracuſians were triumphing, and made ſecure by their preſent Victory, to ſet upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athens. This was no ill Counſel. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greateſt number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the ſpeedy proſecution of a beaten Enemy; ſo might we produce many examples of thoſe, who, having ſlept ſecurely in the boſome of good ſucceſs, have been ſuddenly awaked by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby loſt again all the Honour and Advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias oppoſeth the advice of Demoſthenes: Others ſay, that the Sea-men were againſt it. Whereupon abandonning their Gallies, they all reſolve to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till ſome more favourable Fortune ſhould call them thence. On the other ſide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracuſians to put themſelves preſently into the Field, and to ſtop all the paſſages leading to thoſe Cities of their Enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the preſent. Which humour in ſome of our Commanders at Cadez, loſt us both the Indian Fleet, and the ſpoils of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates the Syracuſian, finding it a loſt labour, to perſwade his Country-men to any haſty proſecution, deviſed this good ſtratagem, thereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he ſhould draw them willingly out. He ſent two or three Horſe-men out of Syracuſe by night, willing them to find Nicias, and (after they had aſſured him, that they were of the Athenians Faction) to give him advice not to march away over haſtily from the place wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracuſians had lodged their Army, which could not long ſtay there upon the paſſages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. Theſe Tidings Nicias eaſily believed, and put off his Journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the moſt part) more fearful than wiſe, and to them, every Thiſtle in the Field, appears by night, a man at arms.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their Baggage) they remove; being pierced and purſued with the lamentable out-cries of thoſe that were ſick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their Enemies Swords. The reſt march away, to the number of forty thouſand; and make their firſt paſſage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of their Enemies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracuſian Horſe-men, beaten in from forraging and proviſion of Food, they grow weak and heartleſs. The Syracuſians alſo poſſeſs the Mountain Lepas, by which they were to paſs towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coaſt, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their Journey intended. Many hard ſhifts they made in difficult paſſages and blind marches by night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to eſcape from the Enemy that purſued them, and held them waking with continual skirmiſhing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vantguard; and Demoſthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the ſtart of a whole nights march, leaving Demoſthenes to make the Retreat: who being incompaſſed, and over-preſt with numbers, in the end renders himſelf. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the Faith of his Enemies far worſe than he ſuſpected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murthered in Priſon. The Army of Demoſthenes being diſſolved, they purſue Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken upon the paſſage of the River Aſſinarus, rendred himſelf to Gylippus upon honeſt conditions. Gylippus ſought to preſerve him, and to have had the honour to have brought theſe two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the Overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had ſaved the Lives of the vanquiſhed; Demoſthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greateſt hurt. Hermocrates alſo, the Commander of the Syracuſian Army, diſſwaded the reſt, by all the art he had, from uſing any barbarous Violence, after ſo noble a Victory. But the cruel and cowardly ſort, (Cowardiſe and Cruelty being inſeparable Paſſions) prevailed, and cauſed theſe brave Captains to be miſerably murthered; one part of their Souldiers to be ſtarved in loathſome Priſons, and the reſt ſold for Slaves. This was the ſucceſs of the Sicilian War, which took end at the River Aſſinarus, the four and twentieth day of May, in the fourſcore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil, the Egeſtans (for whoſe defence againſt the Selinuntines, this late War had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracuſians, ſought help from the Carthaginians, to whom they offered themſelves and their City as their Vaſſals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet conſidering the proſperity of the Syracuſians, and their late Victories over the Athenians, they ſtaied a while to diſpute of the matter, whether they ſhould refuſe or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were ſtreightly allied to the Syracuſians, as may appear by what is paſt. In the end, the Senators of Carthage reſolve upon the Enterpriſe; and (by a trick of their Punick Wit) to ſeparate the Syracuſians from the Selinuntines, they ſend Embaſſadors to Syracuſe: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egeſtans, to compel the Selinuntines to take reaſon, and to reſt content with ſo much of the Lands in queſtion, as they of Syracuſe ſhould think meet to allow them. The Syracuſians approved the motion, for it tended to their own Honour. But the Selinuntines would make no ſuch appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracuſians, with whom they had run one courſe of fortune in the Athenian War, ſhould offer to trouble them, by interpoſing as Arbitrators, in a buſineſs, that themſelves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuſe, and the Syracuſians as ill grant it unto thoſe, that had refuſed to ſtand to the Arbitrament, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon an Army of three hundred thouſand men is ſet out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this Employment, that he might take revenge, as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers Death, the one of them having been ſlain by the Himerans; the other by thoſe of Selinus. Both theſe Cities, Hannibal, in this War, won by force of Arms, ſackt them and burnt them, and having taken three thouſand of the Himerans Priſoners, he cauſed them to be led unto the place where Amilcar was ſlain, and buried them there.

After this, followed ſome trouble at Syracuſe, occaſioned by the Baniſhment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracuſian Forces againſt the Athenians. The malice of his Enemies had ſo far prevailed with the ingrateful Multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meer Vertue, at ſuch time as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians in their War againſt Athens, wherein he did great ſervice. All the honeſter ſort within Syracuſe were ſorry for the injury done unto him, and ſought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himſelf returning into Sicil, gathered an Army of ſix thouſand, with which he began to repair Selinus, and by many noble actions, laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the Faction that oppoſed him was the ſtronger. Wherefore he was adviſed to ſeize upon a Gate of Syracuſe, with ſome ſtrength of men; whereby his Friends within the Town, might have the better means to riſe againſt the adverſe Party. This he did: but preſently the Multitude fell to Arms, and ſet upon him, in which Conflict he was ſlain. But his Son-in-law Dionyſius, ſhall make them wiſh Hermocrates alive again.

†. IV.

Of Dionyſius the Tyrant: and others, following him in Syracuſe.

THe Syracuſians had enjoyed their Liberty about threeſcore years, from the Death of Thraſybulus, to the Death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionyſius was raiſed up by God to take revenge, as well of their Cruelty towards Strangers, as of their Ingratitude towards their own beſt Citizens. For before the time of Dionyſius, they had made it their Paſtime to reward the Vertue of their worthieſt Commanders with Death or Diſgrace: which Cuſtom they muſt now be taught to amend.

Dionyſius obtained the Principality of Syracuſe, by the ſame degrees that many others before him had made themſelves Maſters of other Cities, and of Syracuſe it ſelf. For being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies againſt the Carthaginians and other their Enemies, he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he got a general Love among the People and Men of War. Then began he to follow the Example of Piſiſtratus, that made himſelf Lord of Athens; obtaining a Band of ſix hundred men to defend his Perſon: under pretence, that his private Enemies, being traiterouſly affected to the State of Syracuſe, had laid Plots how to murther him, becauſe of his good ſervices. He doubled the Pay of the Souldiers, alledging that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to aſſure them to himſelf. He perſwaded the Citizens to call home out of exile, thoſe that had been baniſhed, which were the beſt men of Syracuſe; and theſe were afterwards at his devotion, as obliged unto him by ſo great a benefit. His firſt favour among the Syracuſians, grew from his accuſation of the principal men. It is the delight of baſe People to raign over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as Fetters impriſoning their Liberty, the bars that held it under ſafe cuſtody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they ſaw, the People would not ſee: and ſome that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purpoſes to be ſuch, as would make all the City to ſmart. He began early to hunt after the Tyranny, being but five and twenty years of age when he obtained it; belike, it was his deſire to raign long. His firſt work of making himſelf abſolute Lord in Syracuſe, was the poſſeſſion of the Cittadel; wherein was much good proviſion, and under it the Gallies were mored. This he obtained by allowance of the People; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himſelf without all ſhame or fear: The Army, the chief Citizens reſtored by him from baniſhment; all the needy ſort within Syracuſe that could not thrive by honeſt courſes; and ſome neighbour-Towns bound unto him, either for his help in War, or for his eſtabliſhing the Faction, raigning at that preſent; were wholly affected to his aſſiſtance. Having therefore gotten the Cittadel into his hands, he needed no more, ſave to aſſure what he had already. He ſtrengthened himſelf by divers Marriages; taking firſt to Wife the Daughter of Hermocrates, and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionyſius his Succeſſor; the other, Ariſtomache, the Daughter of Hipparinus, and Siſter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuſe, which bare unto him many Children, that ſerved to fortifie him with new Alliances.

Yet it was not long ere ſome of the Syracuſians (envying his proſperity) incited the Multitude, and took Arms againſt him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their Enterpriſe was more paſſionately than wiſely governed. He had ſhamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which as it vexed the Sicilian men at arms, making them ſuſpect that it was his purpoſe to let the Carthaginians waſte all, that he might afterwards take poſſeſſion of the deſolate places; ſo it inflamed them with a deſire to free themſelves from his Tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched haſtily to Syracuſe, where they found Friends to help them: there they forced his Palace, ranſacked his Treaſures, and ſo ſhamefully abuſed his Wife, that for the grief thereof ſhe poiſoned her ſelf. But he followed their heels apace, and firing a Gate of the City by night, entred ſoon enough to take revenge, by making a ſpeedy riddance of them. For he ſpared none of his known, no, not of his ſuſpected Enemies. After that, he grew ſo doubtful of his Life, as he never durſt truſt Barber to trim him, nor any perſon, no, not ſo much as his Brother, to enter into his Chamber unſtript and ſearched. He was the greateſt Robber of the People that ever raigned in any State;

State; and withal, the moſt unreſpectively cruel.

After this, he ſeparated with Fortification that part of the City, called the Iſland, from the reſt; like as the Spaniard did the Citadel of Antwerp: therein he lodged his Treaſures and his Guards.

He then began to make War upon the free Cities of Sicil: but while he lay before Herbeſſe, an in-land Town, the Syracuſians rebelled againſt him, ſo, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadel: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their paſſage through the City with one thouſand and two hundred Horſe, he again recovered the Maſtery over the Syracuſians. And when a multitude of them were buſied in gathering in their Harveſt, he diſarmed all the Townſ-men remaining, and new ſtrengthened the Fort of the Iſland with a double Wall. He incloſed that part alſo called Epipoles; which, with threeſcore thouſand Labourers, he finiſhed in three weeks, being two Leagues in compaſs. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thouſand Targets, with as many Swords and Head-peeces, with fourteen thouſand Corſlets, and all other ſuitable Arms. Which done, he ſent word to the Carthaginians (greatly enfeebled by the Plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns which they held in Sicil, he would make War upon them: and not ſtaying for anſwer, he took the Spoil of all the Phœnician Ships and Merchandiſe within his Ports; as King Philip the ſecond did of our Engliſh before the War in our late Queens time. He then goes to the Field with fourſcore thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, and ſends his Brother Leptines to Sea with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred Ships of Burthen. Moſt of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded unto him, ſaving Panormus, Segeſta or Egeſta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of theſe he firſt won Motya by aſſault, and put all therein to the Sword; but before Egeſta he loſt a great part of his Army by a Sally of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives, but ere he took Land, he loſt in a Fight at Sea with Leptines, fifty Ships of War, and five thouſand Souldiers, beſides many Ships of Burthen. This notwithſtanding, he recovered again Motya upon his firſt deſcent. From thence marching towards Meſſena, he took Lypara, and (ſoon after) Meſſena, and raized it to the ground. Now began Dionyſius greatly to doubt his Eſtate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he ſuppoſed that Himilco would paſs toward Syracuſe, and he himſelf took the Field again, with four and thirty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over land, and ſending Mago with the other by Sea: he ſent Leptines his Brother to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thouſand of his men were ſlain, and an hundred of his Gallies loſt. It is very ſtrange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; that one City ſhould be able to furniſh five hundred ſail of Ships, and two hundred Gallies (for ſo many did Syracuſe arm in this War) and more ſtrange it is, that in a Battel at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Musquet-ſhot, twenty thouſand ſhould be ſlain in one Fight. In all our Fights againſt the Turks, of which that at Lepanto was the moſt notable, we hear of no ſuch number loſt; nor in any other Fight by Sea, that ever hapned in our Age, nor before us. When Charles the fifth went to beſiege Algier, he had in all his Fleet, Tranſporters and others, but two hundred and fifty ſail of Ships, and threeſcore and five Gallies: for the furniſhing of which Fleet, he ſought help from all the Cities and Ports of Spain, Naples, and the reſt of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the Field upon extremity, as many as were needful, of all that could bear Arms, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our days it is not ſo, neither indeed is it often requiſite. Upon this overthrow Dionyſius poſts away to Syracuſe, to ſtrengthen it: Himilco follows him, and beſiegeth the Town by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant having received aid from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himſelf to Sea, to make proviſion for his Citizens: who, in his abſence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and ſink four. Hereupon, finding their own ſucceſs proſperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill, having alſo at the preſent Weapons in their hands; they conſult how to recover their Liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian reſiſted them. It alſo fell out, to his exceeding advantange, that the Plague was ſo increaſed, and ſo violent among the Carthaginians, as it is ſaid, that above an hundred thouſand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the Power that he could gather together, ſets upon them both by Sea and Land, and having ſlain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to deſire Peace. This Peace Dionyſius ſold him for a great ſum of Money, on condition that he ſhould ſteal away with his Carthaginians only: which he baſely accepted, betraying the reſt of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no Faith was kept with him, for he was purſued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The reſt of the Africans fell under the Swords of their Enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themſelves, were (after their ſubmiſſion) entertained, and ſerved the Conquerour.

Many ſuch examples of perfidious dealing have I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practiſes, when they meet with their matches: That which happened unto Monſieur de Piles, was very ſutable to this Treachery, wherewith Dionyſius purſued Himilco. I was preſent when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendred St. John d' Angelie, to the French King Charles the ninth, who beſieged him therein. He rendred it upon promiſe made by the Faith of a King, that he ſhould be ſuffered to depart in ſafety, with all his Followers. Yet in preſence of the King himſelf, of the Duke of Anjou his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marſhals of France, he was ſet upon and broken in his March, ſpoiled of all that he had, and forced to ſave his Life by flight, leaving the moſt of his Souldiers dead upon the place: the Kings Hand and Faith, warranting him to march away with Enſigns diſplaid, and with all his Goods and Proviſions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore ſeem ſtrange, that an Heathen Tyrant ſhould thus break his Faith, ſince Kings, profeſſing Chriſtianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionyſius, after this great Victory, took care to re-edifie Meſſena. Mago, who ſtaid in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionyſius, who is alſo beaten by the Tauromenians. A new ſupply of fourſcore thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to Mago; but they take

Eggs

Eggs for their Money, and make Peace with Dionyſius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to ſhift for themſelves, whom Dionyſius, after a long Siege, overcame, and gave their City to his mercenary Souldiers.

He then paſt into Italy, obtained divers Victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourſcore thouſand Crowns, to furniſh him with threeſcore Gallies, and to put in an hundred Pledges, for aſſurance of their future obſervance of Covenants. This he did, not with any purpoſe to perform unto them the Peace that they had ſo dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might beſiege them, and ruine them utterly with the more eaſe. Now to the end he might not without ſome colour, falſifie the Faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want Victual for his Army, at ſuch time as he ſeemed ready to depart out of Italy, and ſent to them to furniſh him therewith, promiſing to return them the like quantity, at his coming home to Syracuſe.

His reſolution was, that if they refuſed to furniſh him, he would then make their refuſal the cauſe of his Quarrel: if they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he deſired, that then they ſhould not be able, for want of Food, to endure a Siege any long time againſt him. For to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price ſoever. And great reaſon he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of Faith. For when, in the beginning of his Raign, he deſired them to beſtow a Daughter of ſome of their Nobility upon him for a Wife: they anſwered, That they had not any one fit for him, ſave the Hang-mans Daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill Deeds than villainous Words. Alexander the Great forgave many ſharp Swords, but never any ſharp Tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to thoſe that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes, and to none elſe, eſpecially in publique.

It is ſaid, that Henry the Fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed againſt the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting Taunts that he uſed againſt him before Amiens, than for his Conſpiraracy with the Spaniard, or Savoyan: for he had pardoned ten thouſand of ſuch as had gone farther, and drawn their Swords againſt him. The contemptuous words that Sir John Parret uſed of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine, and not the counterfeit Letter of the Romiſh Prieſt, produced againſt him. So fared it with ſome other, greater than he, that thereby ran the ſame, and a worſe Fortune ſoon after.

To be ſhort, he made them know new Bread from old. He aſſaulted their Town on all ſides, which he continued to do eleven months, till he won it by force. He uſed his Victory without mercy; eſpecially againſt Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other Wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and raiſing of this City, and thoſe with variable ſucceſs. For as in one Encounter he ſlew Mago, with ten thouſand Africans: ſo the Son of Mago beat him, and ſlew his Brother Leptines, with fourteen thouſand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his Peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Proſperity and Adverſity, as all Kings and States do.

When he had raigned eight and thirty years, he died: ſome ſay in his bed peaceably, which is the moſt likely, though others report it otherwiſe. A cruel man he was, and a faithleſs; a great Poet, but a fooliſh one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for ſpeaking againſt his Tyranny, he gave order to have him ſlain, or ſold for a Slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond meaſure. His Paraſites therefore ſtiled his Cruelty, The hate of evil men; and his lawleſs Slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his Juſtice. True it is, that Flatterers are a kind of Vermine, which poiſon all the Princes of the World, and yet they proſper better than the worthieſt and valianteſt men do: And I wonder not at it; for it is a World: and as our Saviour Chriſt hath told us, The World will love her own.

To this Dionyſius, his Son of the ſame name ſucceeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the Love of the People, he pardoned, and releaſed out of Priſon, a great number of Perſons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withal, he remitted unto his Citizens divers Payments, by his Father impoſed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had faſtened unto himſelf the Peoples affections; he caſt off the Sheeps Skin, and put on that of the Wolf. For, being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more Vertue than himſelf, he cauſed them all to be ſlain, and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers ſide. For Dionyſius his Father (as hath been ſaid) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Ariſtomache a Syracuſian, the Siſter of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionyſius, who ſucceeded unto him: and by Ariſtomache he had two Sons and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophroſyne, he gave in Matriage to his eldeſt Son, and her half Brother Dionyſius; the younger, called Areta, he beſtowed on his Brother Theorides: after whoſe Death, Dion took her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a juſt and valiant man, finding that Dionyſius had abandoned all exerciſe of Vertue, and that he was wholly given over to ſenſuality, prevailed ſo much with Plato, whoſe Diſciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil to inſtruct the young King. And having perſwaded the King to entertain him, he wrought ſo well with him, as Dionyſius began to change condition, to change Tyranny into Monarchy, and to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the Love of his People, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Garriſons. But this goodneſs of his laſted not long. For Philiſtus the Hiſtorian, and other his Paraſites, that hated Dions ſeverity, wrought him out of the Tyrants Favour, and cauſed him ſoon after to be baniſhed out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionyſius ſtood in great fear, or (at leaſt) if they refuſed it, to furniſh him with fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the War againſt them: his Enemies found means, by ſiniſter interpretation, to convert his good Will into matter of Treaſon. They told Dionyſius, that all the great commendations given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to ſoften his mind, and to make him neglect his own Affairs, by the ſtudy of Philoſophy; whileſt Dion, in the mean time, having furniſhed fifty Gallies, under colour of the Kings ſervice, had it in his own power, either to deliver to the Syracuſians their former Liberty, or to make himſelf Lord and Soveraign of their State.

It

It is likely, that the honeſt and liberal offer which he made, to ſerve the King with ſo great a preparation at his own charge, begot him many Enemies. For they that had ſerved the King for none other end, than to raiſe and enrich themſelves, and had already been raiſed and enriched, thought themſelves bound to make the ſame offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But theſe covetous and ignorant Cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to ſtile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Preſumption, and heartned the young King in his oppreſſing and eating up his own People, of whoſe ſpoils they themſelves ſhared no ſmall portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the Fifth had the repulſe at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Corteſe, one of the braveſt men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperor to continue the Siege at his own charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his Victories, and his Conqueſt of Mexico in the Weſt Indies, perſwaded the Emperor that Corteſe ſought to value himſelf above him, and to have it ſaid, That what the Emperour could not, Corteſe had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire than he that had it.

When Dion was newly baniſhed, the Tyrant was contented at firſt to ſend him the Revenues of his Lands, and permit him to diſpoſe of his Moveables at his own pleaſure: not without giving hope to recall him in ſhort time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleaſed to live well, as he did at Athens. But after ſome time, Dionyſius made Port-ſail of this Noble-mans Goods, and thereby urged him to take another courſe, even to ſeek the reſtitution of his Countrey to liberty. The Vertues of Dion, eſpecially his great Liberality, had purchaſed much Love in Greece. This Love made him ſuſpected and hated of the Tyrant: but it ſtood him in good ſtead, when he ſought to raiſe men, with whoſe help he might return into Sicil. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carried the matter cloſely) to follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuſe, as many as ſhould be needful, that would readily aſſiſt him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuſe, entred the City without reſiſtance; armed the Multitude, and won all, ſave the Citadel.

Dionyſius was then abſent in Italy; but he quickly had advertiſement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned haſtily to Syracuſe: whence, after many vain Treaties of Peace, and ſome forceable attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart; leaving yet the Caſtle to the cuſtody of Apollocrates, his eldeſt Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philiſtus, coming with a ſtrength of men to aſſiſt him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries Liberty, had the ſame reward that all worthy men have had from popular Eſtates. He was diſgraced, aſſaulted, and forced to abandon the City. He retireth himſelf to the Leontines, who receive him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuſe, new Troops enter the Caſtle: they ſally out, aſſail, ſpoil and burn a great part of the City. Dion is ſent for, with humble requeſt: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionyſius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townſmen thinking themſelves ſecure, ſhut the Gates againſt Dion. But the next night, they of the Caſtle ſally again with greater fury than ever; and kill Man, Woman, and Child, and ſet fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity, Dion comes the ſecond time to their ſuccour; the love of his Country ſurmounting all the injuries that he had received. He ſets upon the Garriſon of the Caſtle with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire, every where kindled with the other part. In concluſion, after he had conquered both the Fire and the Sword, that had well near burnt to aſhes and depopulated Syracuſe, he recovered the Caſtle, with the Munition and Furniture thereof, and ſent Apollocrates after Dionyſius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had beſt deſerved, and whom he had loved moſt, gave an untimely end to his days. For he was ſoon after this his Victory, murthered by Calippus; who, after he had, with ill ſucceſs, a while governed Syracuſe, was ſlain with the ſame Dagger, with which he had murthered Dion.

Ten years after the death of Dion, Dionyſius, with the aſſiſtance of his Friends in Italy, recovers his Eſtate, and returns to Syracuſe, driving Nyſæus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better ſort of the Citizens, fearing, more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracuſian born, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their aſſiſtance, not only to prevail againſt Dionyſius, but by the hatred of the Syracuſians towards Dionyſius, to make him alſo Lord of their City. The Syracuſians being deſervingly afflicted on all ſides, ſend to the Corinthians for ſuccour. Icetes alſo ſends thither, and diſſwades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the buſineſs. He tells them by his Meſſengers, that he had entred into League with the Carthaginians, who were ſo ſtrong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth to land any Army in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this Treaſon of Icetes, more inraged than diſſwaded, ſent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies to deliver Syracuſe from tyranny. In the mean while, Icetes had entred Syracuſe, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionyſius into the Caſtle, wherein he beſieged him.

Icetes, being himſelf a Tyrant in Leontium, rather ſought how to enlarge his Power, than how to deliver his Country. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he ſent to perſwade him to return his Fleet, for that all things were (in effect) eſtabliſhed in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were alſo in the ſame Port of Rhegium; whoſe Captains adviſed Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compel him, if he would not be perſwaded. Timoleon finding himſelf over-maſtered, makes requeſt to the Carthaginian Captains, that they would be pleaſed to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open aſſembly of the People, to deliver unto him thoſe arguments for his return, which they had uſed to him in private; that he might, by publique teſtimony, diſcharge himſelf to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians perſwading themſelves, that a Victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loſs, and far more eaſie than that of many blows and wounds, yielded to Timoleons deſire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, ſtole out of the Preſs; and having ſet ſail before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched towards Adranum, where ſurpriſing

Icetes

Icetes his Army, he ſlew a part thereof, and put the reſt to run. It is the nature of Victory to beget friends. The Adranitans joyned with him, and ſo did Mamercus the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyſius alſo ſent to Timoleon, offering to ſurrender the Caſtle of Syracuſe into his hands: as thinking it better to yield up himſelf, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he diſdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fifty days after his arrival, had recovered the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and ſent Dionyſius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was ſtill invaded by the Armies, and moleſted by the practiſes of Icetes. For he beſieged the Corinthians within the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and attempted (but in vain) the Murther of Timoleon.

The Corinthians ſend unto Timoleon a ſupply of two thouſand foot, and two hundred Horſe, which are ſtaid in Italy by foul weather. Icetes is ſtrengthened with threeſcore thouſand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuſe) and with an hundred and fifty Gallies to keep the Port. This was the firſt time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the Walls of that City. With this great Army, Icetes aſſaulteth the Caſtle. Timoleon ſends them Victuals and ſuccour in ſmall Boats by night from Catana. Mago and Icetes do therefore reſolve to beſiege Catana; but they were no ſooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, ſallied out of the Caſtle, and took that part of Syracuſe, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the two thouſand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thouſand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched towards Syracuſe. Mago abandoneth Icetes, being frighted out of Sicil (which he might eaſily have conquered) with an idle rumour of Treaſon. This made him return to Carthage, where the general exclamation againſt his Cowardize, did ſo much affright him, that for fear of farther puniſhment, he hanged himſelf. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Caſtle (which he called the Neſt of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the Strangers were fled, in effect deſolate, ſo as their Horſes did feed on the Graſs growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for People to re-inhabit it. Ten thouſand are ſent out of Greece; many come from Italy, others from other parts of the Iſland.

But a new ſtorm ariſeth. Aſdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybæum, with threeſcore and ten thouſand Souldiers tranſported (with all their Proviſion) in a thouſand Ships of Burthen, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the paſſage of a River.

A Tempeſt of Rain, Hail, and Lightning, with boiſtrous Winds beating upon the Faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken: ten thouſand ſlain, five thouſand taken, with all their Carriages and Proviſions: among which, there were found a thouſand Corſlets, guilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his Victory, took him, with his Son Eupolemus, and the General of his Horſe, Priſoners, whom he cauſed all to be ſlain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he ſuffered Icetes his Wives and Daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Icetes, who (after the murther of Dion) had cauſed Arete, Dions Wife, and a young Child of his, with Ariſtomache his Siſter, to be caſt into the Sea.

Plut. in vit. Tim.

He again prevailed againſt Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it ſelf. Mamercus fled to Hippon, Tyrant of Meſſena: but Timoleon purſuing him, won the Town, delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The ſame end had Mamerchus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made Peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they ſhould not paſs the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracuſians, till his Death, and was ſolemnly buried by them in the Market-place of their City: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After ſuch time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuſe from the Tyranny of Dionyſius, and brought Peace to the whole Iſland, the Inhabitants enjoyed their Liberty in peace about twenty years. The Cities and Temples were repaired, the Trade renewed, the Merchant ſailed in ſafety, and the labouring Man enjoyed the fruits of the Earth in quiet. But it was impoſſible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings to govern them, ſhould any long time ſubſiſt.

Twenty years after the death of Timoleon, there ſtarted up an Agathocles among them, a man of baſe Birth, and of baſer Condition; who from a Beggar to a common Souldier, from a Souldier to a Captain, and ſo from degree to degree, riſing to be a Prætor; finally, became Lord and Soveraign of the Syracuſians. Many fortunes he ran, and underwent as many dangers ere he obtained the Principality. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and baniſh'd. A paſſing valiant man he was, and did notable ſervice, as well for thoſe by whom he was imployed, as alſo for the Syracuſians, and againſt them. For in their Wars againſt thoſe of Enna and the Campanes, he did them memorable ſervice: and on the contrary, as memorable ſervice for the Murgantines, againſt the Syracuſians. For being entertained by the People of Murgantia, and made General of their Forces, he ſackt Leontium; and beſieged Syracuſe ſo ſtreightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and natural Enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was ſent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuſe. With him Agathocles wrought ſo well, that he got him to make Peace between himſelf and the Syracuſians, binding himſelf by Promiſe and Oath, to remain a Friend and Servant to the Eſtate of Carthage for ever after. Amilcar entertained the buſineſs, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracuſians. Agathocles is choſen Prætor, he entertains five thouſand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpoſe to beſiege Herbita. With theſe, and with the aſſiſtance of the poor and diſcontented Syracuſians (the City being alſo divided into many Factions) he aſſails the Senators, kills all his Enemies and Oppoſites, divides the ſpoil of the Rich among the Poor, and gives liberty to his Souldiers to Rob, to Raviſh, and to Murther, for two whole days and nights without controulment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous Appetites, and ſtrewed the Streets with ten thouſand dead Carkaſſes, beſides thoſe that had broken their Necks over the Walls, their Fury had no further ſubject to work on.

Agathocles, in an aſſembly of the People (being an eloquent Knave) perſwaded them, that for the violent Sickneſs, by which the Common-wealth was utterly conſumed, he found no better than the the violent remedies which he had adminiſtred; and that he had affected no other thing, than the reducing of the State from an Oligarchy, or the Rule of a few tyrannous Magiſtrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democracy, by which it had been governed, from the firſt inſtitution, with ſo great glory and proſperity. This he did, to have the Crown clapt on his Head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew that he had left none living within the City fit nor able to exerciſe the Office of a Magiſtrate, ſo knew he right well, that all they which had aſſiſted in the Murther and Spoil of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the ſupport of a lawleſs Lord, who had been partaker with them in their Villanies and Cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again, ſaluting, and adoring him by that Name, as if it had been given to him by ſome lawful Election. Hence had our King Richard the Third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of baſe, the other of Kingly Parents; the one took liberty from a Common-wealth, the other ſought only to ſucceed in a Monarchy; the one continued his Cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, ſought, by making of good Laws, to recover the Love of his People.

The Life of this Tyrant is briefly written by Juſtin; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the ſum whereof is this. The ſame Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuſe, and that had lent him five thouſand men to help in the Maſſacre of the Citizens, was alſo content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpoſe of Amilcar, to ſettle Agathocles in his Tyranny, and to let him vex and waſte the whole Iſland, becauſe it was thereby like to come to paſs, that he ſhould reduce all Sicil into ſuch terms, as would make it become an eaſie Prey to Carthage. But when the Cities confederate with the Carthaginians ſent their Embaſſadors with complaint of this ill dealing to Carthage; the Punick Faith (ſo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meer falſhood) ſhewed it ſelf very honourable, in taking order for the redreſs. Embaſſadors were ſent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captain appointed to ſucceed in his charge, with ſuch Forces, as might compel Agathocles to reaſon, if otherwiſe he would not hearken to it. All this tended to ſave their Confederates from ſuffering ſuch injuries in the future. For that which was paſt (ſince it could not be recalled) they took order to have it ſeverely puniſhed. Amilcar was accuſed ſecretly, and by way of ſcrutiny: the ſuffrages being given, but not calculated, and ſo reſerved until he ſhould return. This was not ſo cloſely handled, but that Amilcar had ſome notice of it. In managing his buſineſs with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made ſuch a Compoſition with the Syracuſian, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelf both in Power and Authority, even againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtom of thoſe that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices; thinking to deal ſubtilly, and finally, they ſpin their Threads ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very Wind. Amilcar ſaw that his Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deal ſubſtantially, and that therefore it would be hard for him to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into ſo much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example which ſome of his foregoers had taught him; and for fear of ſuch a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerved to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolved to get the ſtart of them in action. He diſſembled no longer, but inſtead of Spoil and Robbery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his own ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have encountred an ill eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them ſharp entertainment. They were beaten by him, and their Navy was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land nor Sea, but were glad to leave their buſineſs undone, and return into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furniſhed, was broken by foul weather, and the beſt part of it caſt away, even whileſt it was yet kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of this Ship-wrack, was bold to paſs over into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela: where Agathocles was ſoon ready to examine the cauſe of their coming. Many Skirmiſhes paſſed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſs begat preſumption; whereby he loſt a Battel, more important than all the other Fights. One adverſe chance is enough to overthrow the State of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumſpection. The War was ſoon transferred to the Walls of Syracuſe, within which Agathocles was cloſed up, and driven to make his laſt defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great Maſſacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the moſt part) ſuch as had been either mercinary Souldiers, infranchiſed Slaves, or baſe and needy People; helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent Government, and Executioners of the Murthers and Spoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerved, and (withall) ſo fearful, that they durſt not ſtir. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and enforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſity Agathocles adventured upon a ſtrange courſe, which the event commended as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet in thoſe Veſſels that rode in the Haven; and committing the Government of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the People to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himſelf of a mean, both to raiſe the Siege, and to repair all other loſſes. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the Mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of Victuallers, and to keep the beſieged from iſſuing forth.

Now at ſuch time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertiſement came that many Ships of Burthen laden with Corn and other Proviſions, were drawing near unto Syracuſe. To intercept theſe, the Carthaginians hoiſe ſail, and launch forth into the deep. They were not far gone when they might behold Agathocles iſſuing forth of the Port, with purpoſe (as they thought) to give Convoy unto his Victuallers. Hereupon they wheel about, and make amain towards him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all ſpeed towards Africk, and was purſued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would give them light. In the mean ſeaſon the Victuallers were gotten into Syracuſe, which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburthened the place of no ſmall number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived; firſt, that by purſuing two Fleets at once, he had miſſed of them both; and ſecondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to ſeek his Fortune elſewhere; he thought it good to purſue thoſe that were fled, and to attend ſo well upon them, that they ſhould not have leiſure to do miſchief in ſome other part.

The Carthaginian Navy followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of ſuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after ſix days. He had (at the firſt) a great ſtart of them, ſo that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themſelves in ſeeking their own misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them, and having ſunk or taken many, drave the reſt to fly which way they could, laden with ſtrange tidings of his Voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he diſcover unto them his project; letting them underſtand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuſe, but from all the Iſle of Sicil, than by bringing the War to their own doors. For here (ſaid he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take arms againſt them, as ſoon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which dares to look upon their Walls. Their Towns are ill fortified, their People untrained and unexperienced in dangers; the mercinary Forces that they levy in theſe parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater Wages than they can give: which we may better promiſe and make good, by letting them have ſome ſhare with us in all the Wealth of the Carthaginians, than our Enemies can do, by making ſome addition to their Stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Maſter of all the riches in Africk, and with many brave words encouraged his men ſo well, that they were contented to ſet fire on all their Ships (reſerving one or two to uſe as Meſſengers) to the end that no hope ſhould remain, ſave only in Victory. In this heat of reſolution, they win by force two Cities, which after they had throughly ſacked, they burnt to the ground, as a mark of terrour to all that ſhould make reſiſtance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed, thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army deſtroyed in Sicil. This impreſſion ſo diſmaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by ſuch as had ſcaped in the late Sea-fight, yet ſtill they fear, and know not what. They ſuſpect Amilcars Faith, who had ſuffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they ſuſpect their principal Citizens at home of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the Enemy; they raiſe a great Army, and know not unto whoſe charge they may ſafely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno, and Bomilcar; great Enemies, and therefore the more unlikely to conſpire againſt the Common-wealth. Theſe are made generals of the Army levied, which far exceeded the Forces of Agathocles. But it ſeldom happens, that diſſention between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Neceſſity drave Agathocles to fight, and the courage of his men reſolved to deal with the whole Multitude of the Carthaginians, made eaſie the Victory againſt the one half of them. For Bomilcar would not ſtir: but ſuffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this Victory brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Society, to take part with Agathocles, who purſuing his Victory, wins many Towns, and ſends word to Syracuſe of his good ſucceſs. The Carthaginians alſo ſend into Sicil, willing Amilcar their General, to ſuccour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be loſt, whileſt he was travelling in the Conqueſt of Sicil. Amilcar ſends them five thouſand men; all his Forces he thought it not needful to tranſport, as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one that could ſcarce retain his own Kingdom. But theſe good hopes had a bad iſſue. He ſpent ſome time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracuſians: and having brought his matters to ſome good order, he conceived a ſudden hope of taking Syracuſe by ſurpriſe. It was a pretty (though tragical) accident, if it were true, as Tully relates it. Amilcar had a Dream, which told him that he ſhould ſup the next day within Syracuſe. His Fancy begot this Dream, and he believed it. He made more haſte than good ſpeed toward the City: and coming upon it on the ſudden, had good hope to carry it. But his Enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an Ambuſh to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried Priſoner into the City, in which it was likely that he had no great Chear to his Supper: for they ſtruct of his Head, and ſent it into Africk (a welcome Preſent) to Agathocles.

This good ſucceſs of things at home, did put ſuch courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and ſtile himſelf King of Africk. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promiſes to deliver the Country into his hands: for that (as he ſaid) it was ſufficient unto himſelf to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this War ended) he might raign quietly. Ophellas came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian taking an advantage, did murther this his Aſſiſtant: and afterwards, by good Words, and great Promiſes, drew all the Cyrenian Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his Villainy found good ſucceſs, and he ſo prevailed in Africk, that he got leiſure to make a ſtep into Sicil. Many Towns in Sicil had imbraced a deſire of recovering their Liberty, thinking it high time to fight at length for their own Freedom, after that they had ſo long been expoſed (as a reward of Victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. Theſe had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cauſe: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high Spirits, and his good ſucceſs in many Fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicil he returned into Africk, where his Affairs ſtood in very bad terms. Archagathus his Son had loſt a Battel, and (which was worſe) had ill means to help himſelf, his Army being in mutiny for lack of Pay. But Agathocles pacified the Tumult, by the accuſtomed Promiſes of great Booty and Spoil. It had now been time for him to offer Peace to the Carthaginians, which to obtain, they would (queſtionleſs) have given to him both Money enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their City had been diſtreſſed, not only by this his War, but by the Treaſon of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himſelf Tyrant over them. But Ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the Conqueſt of Carthage it ſelf: out of which which dream he was awaked, by the loſs of a Battel, not ſo memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the ſtrange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this War, had renewed their old Sacrifices of Children to Saturn, from which they had abſtained ever ſince they made Peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of ſome, the goodlieſt of their Priſoners taken in the Battel, to offer unto the ſaid Idol, in way of thankfulneſs for their Victory. The Fire with which theſe unhappy men were conſumed, caught hold upon the Lodgings neareſt unto the Altar, and ſpreading it ſelf farther through the Camp, with the deſtruction of many men, cauſed ſuch a Tumult as is uſual in the like caſes. At the ſame time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them believing that the noiſe in the adverſe Camp, was a ſign of the Enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a ſafe retreat: Agathocles, by a ſecond errour, fell into a new Calamity. In the beginning of this his Flight in the dark, he met with his own African Souldiers, and thinking them to be Enemies (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him to the Carthaginians, in the laſt Battel) he began to aſſail them, and was ſo ſtoutly reſiſted, that he loſt in this blind Fight, above four thouſand of his men. This did ſo diſcourage his proud Heart, that being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto ſome diſtruſt of his own ſafety, he knew no more how to moderate his preſent weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his Ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his Head; which was, to ſteal cloſely aboard his Ships with his younger Son (the elder he ſuſpected of Inceſt, and of Ambition) and ſo to fly into Sicil; thinking it the beſt courſe to ſhift for himſelf, as wanting Veſſels wherein to tranſport his Army. His elder Son Archagathus perceiving his drift, arreſted him, and put him under cuſtody; but by means of a ſudden Tumult, he was let looſe, eſcaped, and fled alone, leaving both his Sons behind him, his Flight being noiſed through the Army, all was in uproar, and extremity of rage cauſed not only the common Souldiers, but even ſuch as had been Friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two Sons and kill them. That this Flight of Agathocles was extreamly baſe; I need not uſe words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is ſaid to be, a paſſion, depriving him of the ſuccours which reaſon offered, the ſequel doth manifeſt. His forſaken Souldiers being now a headleſs Company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheleſs a reaſonable compoſition from the Carthaginians: to whom they ſold thoſe places whereof they had poſſeſſion, for nineteen Talents. Likewiſe Agathocles himſelf, having loſt his Army, did nevertheleſs, by the reputation of this late War, make Peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from forraign Enemies, diſcovered his bloody Nature in moſt abominable Cruelties among the Sicilians. His Wants and his Fears urged him ſo violently, that he was not ſatisfied with the Spoils of the Rich, or the death of thoſe whom he held ſuſpected: but in a beaſtly rage, depopulated whole Cities. He deviſed new Engines of Torment; wherein ſtriving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a Frame of Braſs, that ſhould ſerve to ſcorch mens Bodies, and withal, give him leave to behold them in their Miſery. So devilliſh is the nature of man, when reaſon, that ſhould be his guide, is become a Slave to his brutiſh Affections. In theſe miſchiefs he was ſo outragious, that he neither ſpared Sex nor Age; eſpecially when he was informed of the Slaughter of his Children in Africk. But this was not the way to preſerve his Eſtate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chaſed out of their Country, took arms againſt him, and drave him into ſuch fear, that he was fain to ſeek the Love at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all thoſe Towns of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his poſſeſſion. They requited him honourably with great ſtore of Corn, and with four hundred Talents of Gold and Silver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed againſt the Rebels, and ſetled his Eſtate. Having no further buſineſs left in Sicil, he made a Voyage into Italy. There he ſubdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his Name, than by any force, for they yielded at his firſt coming. This done, he went to the Iſle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy Peace with one hundred Talents of Gold. But when he had gotten this great Sum, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to ſpoil the Temples of their Gods. Herein (methinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe thoſe to be Gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible Perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven Ships loaden with Gold: all which, and all the reſt of his Fleet, were caſt away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himſelf eſcaped, to ſuffer a more miſerable end. A grievous Sickneſs fell upon him, that rotted his whole Body, ſpreading it ſelf through all his Veins and Sinews. Whileſt he lay in this caſe, all deſiring his end, ſave only Theogenia (a Wife that he had taken out of Ægypt) and her ſmall Children: his Nephew, the Son of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger Son of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they ſeek to end the Controverſie by the old Tyrants deciſion; they regarded him not ſo much. But each of them laid wait for the others Life, wherein the Nephew ſped ſo well, that he ſlew his Uncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdom without asking any leave. Theſe Tidings wounded the Heart of Agathocles with fear and ſorrow. He ſaw himſelf without help like to become a Prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himſelf, or by thoſe whom only he now held dear, which were Theogenia and her Children. Therefore he adviſed her and them to fly before they were ſurpriſed: for that otherwiſe they could by no means avoid, either Death, or ſomewhat that would be worſe. He gave them all his Treaſures and Goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him deſolate in ſo wretched a caſe) to imbark themſelves haſtily, and make ſpeed into Ægypt. After their departure, whether he threw himſelf into the fire, or whether his Diſeaſe conſumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his Life as baſely, as obſcurely, and in as much want as he firſt began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiterouſly occupied Meſſana, and infeſted a great part of the Iſland. Then alſo did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot find. Likely it is, that he quickly periſhed. For the Sicilians were driven to send for Pyrrhus to help them, who had married with a Daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soon weary of the Country (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly Champain Field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which business, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our Story will declare.

§. V.

A re-continuation of the Roman War in Sicil.. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his Peace with Rome.

WHen Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his Victory gotten at Messana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seek Peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himself by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without fear of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the Mastery. In this good mood, the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Octacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his Friendship. Yet they made use of their present advantage, and sold him Peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Army into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hiero to their side. If the Syracusian held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the sum of Money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of Service) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the Friendship of Carthage, no less to his Honour, than it was to his Commodity. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his own Kingdom to run into manifest peril of subversion for their sakes, that should have received all the profit of the Victory: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse in the days of Agathocles: and therefore knew that it was able to bear out a very strong Siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack in sending help: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the Besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to try the utermost hazard of War against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into Slavery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could withdraw it from the Party of their Enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his own Tyranny: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the Love of his People, by seeking their Commodity; but including his own Felicity within the publique, laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithful dealing. Hereby it came to pass that he enjoyed a long and happy Raign; living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himself ere he left their Society, made unwilling to seek his Ruine; or their more earnest business with the Romans, made unable to compass it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a Fleet. Their first loss, and first Victory by Sea. Of Sea-fight in general.

HIeron having sided himself with the Romans, aided them with Victuals and other Necessaries: so that they presuming upon his assistance, recall some part of their Forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to bestir them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the Troops they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum, the Seat of the War against the Romans, filling it with all manner of Munition.

The Roman Consuls having made Peace with Hieron, return into Italy; and in their places, Lucius Posthumius, and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They go on towards * Agrigentum: and finding no Enemy in the Field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fifty thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of Harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather Corn, and those at the Siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sally furiously, and indanger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their Guards, and the Besieged kept within their Covert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep Trench between the Walls of the City and their Camp, and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter suddenly, by a sally, nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: which double defence kept the Besieged also from the receiving any relief of Victuals and Munitions, whilest the Syracusian supplies the Assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage: after they had been in this sort pent up five months. The Carthaginians imbark an Army, with certain Elephants, under the Command of Hanno; who arrives with it at

* Agrigentum was a goodly City built by the Geloi, under conduct of Ariston and Pystilus. The compass was ten miles about the Walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This City by reason of the fertility of the Soil, and the Neighbourhood of Carthage, grew in a short space, from small beginnings to great Glory and Riches. The Plenty and Luxury thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuosity, as if they meant to live for ever; and made such Feasts, as if they meant to die the next day. But their greatest Pomp and Magnificence, was in their goodly Temples and Theaters, Water-conduits and Fish-ponds, the Ruines whereof at this day are sufficient argument, that Rome it self could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius (by which we may judge of the Temple it self) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants fighting with the Gods, all cut out in polished Marble of divers colours; a Work, the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen: on the other side, the War of Troy, and the Encounters which happned at that Siege, with the Personages of the Heroes that were doers in that War, all of the like beautiful Stone, and of equal stature to the Bodies of men in those ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind are but petty things, and meer trifles. It would require a Volume, to express the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Æsculapius, Concord, Juno Lacinia, Chastitie, Proserpina, Castor and Pollux; wherein the Master-pieces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers, Phidias, Zeuxis, Myron, and Polycletus were to be seen. But in process of time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of war; whereof this War present brought unto it not the least.

Heraclea,

Heraclea, to the Weſt of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himſelf into the Field, and ſurpriſeth Erbeſus, a City wherein the Romans had beſtowed all their Proviſion. By means hereof, the Famine without grew to be as great as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman Camp no leſs ſtreightly aſſieged by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: inſomuch, as if Hieron had not ſupplied them, they had been forced to abandon the Siege. But ſeeing that this diſtreſs was not enough to make them riſe; Hanno determined to give them Battel. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans reſolve to ſuſtain him, and put themſelves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian Horſe-men to charge their Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay ſhadowed behind ſome riſing ground. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans purſued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having ſlaughtered many, beats the reſt into their Trenches.

After this Encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay ſtrongly incamped, waiting until ſome opportunity ſhould invite them. But Annibal, that was beſieged in Agrigentum, as well by Signs as Meſſengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremity which he indured, was able to brook ſuch dilatory courſes. Hanno thereupon, a ſecond time, provoked the Conſuls to fight. But his Elephants being diſordered by his own Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he loſt the day: and with ſuch as eſcaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopeleſs of ſuccour, reſolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this days Victory, wearied with labour, and ſecured by their good fortune, kept negligent Watch in the night; he ruſht out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and paſt by the Roman Camp without reſiſtance. The Conſuls purſue him in the morning, but in vain: ſure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little ado the Romans entred, and pitifully ſpoiled. The Romans, proud of this Victory, purpoſe henceforth rather to follow the direction of their preſent good fortunes, than their firſt determinations. They had reſolved in the beginning of this War, only to ſuccour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own Coaſts: but now they determine to make themſelves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being favoured with the wind of good ſucceſs, to ſail over into Africk. It is the diſeaſe of Kings, of States, and of private Men, to covet the greateſt things, but not to enjoy the leaſt; the deſire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true uſe and fruition of what we have already. This curſe upon mortal men, was never taken from them ſince the beginning of the World to this day.

To proſecute this War, Lucius Valerius, and Titus Otacilius, two new Conſuls, are ſent into Sicil. Whereupon the Romans being Maſters of the Field, many inland Towns gave themſelves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping ſtill the Lordſhip of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to ſecure their own Coaſts, often invaded by the African Fleets, as alſo to equal themſelves in every kind of Warfare with their Enemies, determine to make a Fleet. And herein Fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in Shipwrights craft, a ſtorm of wind thruſt one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks to the ſhore.

Now had the Romans a pattern, and by it they began to ſet up an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies rowed by five on every bank, and twenty, of three on a bank: and while theſe were in preparing, they exerciſed their men in the Feat of Rowing. This they did after a ſtrange faſhion. They placed upon the Sea-ſands many Seats, in order of the Banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their Water-men, and taught them to beat the Sand with long Poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Maſter, that ſo they might learn the ſtroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their Fleet was finiſhed, ſome rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Conſuls (for they changed every year) was made Admiral: who being more in love with this new kind of Warfare, than well adviſed, paſt over to Meſſena with ſeventeen Gallies, leaving the reſt to follow him. There he ſtaid not, but would needs row alongſt the Coaſt to Lipara, hoping to do ſome piece of ſervice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the ſame time Governour in Panormus; who being advertiſed of this new Sea-mans arrival, ſent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with twenty Gallies, to entertain him. Boodes falling upon the Conſul unawares, took both him and the Fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good news, together with the Roman Gallies and their Conſul; he grew no leſs fooliſh hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himſelf to ſurpriſe the reſt of the Roman Fleet, on their own Coaſt, ere they were yet in all points provided; ſought them out with a Fleet of fifty Sail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard eſcape with the reſt: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had loſt but ſeventeen, ſo as one hundred and three remained, which were not eaſily beaten by fifty.

The Romans being advertiſed of Cornelius his overthrow, make haſte to redeem him, but give the Charge of their Fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, conſidering that the Roman Veſſels were heavy and ſlow, the African Gallies having the ſpeed of them, deviſed a certain Engine in the Prow of his Gallies, whereby they might faſten or grapple themſelves with their Enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies ſides together. This done, the weightier Ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans loſt it. For neither did their ſwiftneſs ſerve them, nor their Mariners craft; the Veſſels wherein both Nations fought, being open, ſo that all was to be carried by the advantage of Weapon, and Valour of the Men. Beſides this, as the heavier Gallies were likely to cruſh and crack the ſides of the lighter and weaker, ſo were they, by reaſon of their breadth, more ſteddy; and thoſe that beſt kept their feet, could alſo beſt uſe their hands. The example may be given between one of the long Boats of his Majeſties great Ships, and a London Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a Fight at Sea, muſt be skilful in making choice of Veſſels to fight in: he muſt believe that there is more belonging to a good man of War upon the Waters, than great during; and muſt know, that there is a great deal of difference between fighting looſe or at large, and grapling. The Guns of a ſlow Ship pierce as well, and make as great holes as thoſe in a ſwift. To clap Ships together without conſiconsideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of War: for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Stroſie lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquess of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been lost in the year 1588. if he had not been better advised, than a great many malignant Fools were, that found fault with his Demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboard them; and he had none: they had more Ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that had he intangled himself with those great and powerful Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equal to an hundred that board and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred for twenty of ours, to defend themselves withal. But our Admiral knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his Head. Here to speak in general of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Press) I say, That a Fleet of twenty Ships, all good Sailers and good Ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good Ships, and of slower sailing. For if the Fleet of an hundred sail keep themselves near together in a gross squadron, the twenty Ships charging them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their next Fellows: of which, so many as intangle, are made unserviceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twenty Ships which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillery, by clapping into the Wind, and staying, they may give them the other: and so the twenty Ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual Volly, whereas those that fight in a Troup have no room to turn, and can always use but one and the same beaten side. If the Fleet of an hundred sail give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser Fleet prevail, either against those that are a-rear and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of over-sailing their Fellows keep the wind: and if upon a Lee-shore, the Ships next the wind be constrained to fall back into their own Squadron, then it is all to nothing, that the whole Fleet must suffer Shipwrack, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a Fleet of unequal speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Thuſyd. l. 6.

Of the Art of War by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a Subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or modern: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his loss; by the loss of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and sorrows; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians, who by losing their advantage of swift Boats, and boarding the Romans, have lost fifty sail of their Gallies: as on the other side, their Enemies, by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to sail about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the Siege laid unto Segesta by the Carthaginians, and won the Town of Macella, with some other places.

§. VII.

Divers Enterfeits of War, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: and obtain a great Victory at Sea.

THe Victory of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naval Triumph that was ever seen in that City; so gave it unto the Romans a great incouragement to proceed in their Wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicil, but all the other Isles between Italy and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soon after they sent a Fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions that might help to recompence the late misfortune: and being advertised that some quarrel was grown between the Roman Souldiers and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incamp a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set upon them, who taking them unawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-war in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new Fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the Conquest of which Island, the Romans had entertained for their next Enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans crossing the Seas from Sicil, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new Fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, and took the better part of the Fleet which he conducted, himself hardly escaping their danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good-friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate Voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligence: for (as it hath been said of old) Non est bis in Bello peccare; In War it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till * Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had sought in vain to draw the Carthaginians into the Field; being unable to force that great City, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and took certain in-land Towns, as Mytistratum, Ennà, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Messana. The year following, C. Atilius the Consul, who commanded the Roman Fleet, discovered a Company of the Carthaginian

* If we may give credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus, a diligent writer, hath left us in his History of Sicil; Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the first Cities that hath been built in all Europe. For whereas Thucydides seems to make it a Colony of the Phœnicians, Romans, in libello de Panorm. lib. 6. affirms, that it was first, and long before the time which Thucydides sets down, founded by the Chaldeans and Damascenes. To prove which, he tells us of two Inscriptions upon Marble, in the Hebrew Character, found at Panormus in the time of William the second, King of Sicil, that were then beheld of all the Citizens and other Strangers, which being translated into Latine, say as followeth. Vivens Isaac filio Abrahæ, & regnante in Idumea, atque in Valle Damascena, Esau filio Isaac; ingens Hebræorum manus, quibus adjuncti sunt multi Damasceni, atque Phœnices, profecti in hanc triangularem Insulam, sedes perpetuas locaverunt in hoc amœnissimo loco, quem Panormum nominaverunt. In the other Marble Table are found these words. Non est alius Deus præter unum Deum; non est alius Potens, præter eundem Deum, &c. Hujus Turris Præfectus est Saphu, filius Eliphar filii Esau, fratris Jacob filii Isaac, filii Abrahami: & Turri quidem ipsi nomen est Bayeh; sed Turri huic proxima mœnia est Pharah. And this Inscription (saith Fazellus) was found intire in the Castle Bayeh, in the year 1534. Now whether these Inscriptions were truly as ancient as these men believe they were, I leave every man to his own faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth, when the Greeks past first into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians inhabited Panormus: which certain it is that they did in the first Punick War; to wit, the Carthaginians, who were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius, and C. Cornelius commanding this Army) took it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracuse, it sent him in aid three thousand Souldiers. But it was rather confederate than subject to the Romans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free Cities of Sicil. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first City and Regal Seat, as well of the Goths and Saracens in that Island, as of the Emperors of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Aragonians: which honour it holds to this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent Wine which grows about it.

Gallies,

Gallies, ranging the Coast, and not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste he made, and lost all, save the Gally which transported him: wherein himself escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his Fleet was gotten up: who renewing the Fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which, the Victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a Fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies, the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty,  Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

 The Quinqueremes are Gallies, wherein every Oar hath five men to draw it; the Quadriremes had four to an Oar; and the Triremes three. Some have thought that the Quinqueremes had five ranks of Oars one over another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been so, they must then have had five Decks, each over other: which hath seldom been seen in Ships of a thousand Tuns; neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, have reached unto the Water with their Oars.

The Romans resolve to transport the War into Africk; the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the Coast of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their Fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the Waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman Fleet was divided into four parts, of which the three first made the form of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first Squadrons making the Flancks, and the third Squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admirals) looking toward the Enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third Squadron. After all came up, the fourth, in form of a Crescent, very well manned, but exceeding thin: so that the Horns of it inclosed all the third Squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian Fleet, I cannot conceive by the relation; but, by the manner of the Fight afterwards, I conjecture that the Front of their Fleet was thin, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en bais; a long Front of Horse, and thin, which form, since the Pistol prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out-stretched Front, their Battalions were more sollid. For Amilcar, Admiral of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them of purpose (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that when the first Fleet of the Romans hasted to break through the first Gallies, they should all turn tail, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a Victory) disorder themselves, and for eagerness of taking the Run-aways, leave their other three Squadrons far behind them. For so must it needs fall out, seeing that the third Squadron towed their Horse-boats, and Victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin Front of the Carthaginian first Fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second Squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the Body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) received great loss, till their second Squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oars. Hanno also, who commanded the right Wing of the Carthaginian Fleet invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their Heels, as not able to sustain both Squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Consuls came to the aid of their third Battalion, which towed their Victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Consuls joyning their Squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running. This Victory fell to the Romans, partly by the hardiness of their Souldiers, but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after joyn himself to any of his other Squadrons, that remained as yet in fair likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon even terms, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the Fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman Fleet uningaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppress. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but four and twenty of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirty that were sunk, and threescore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his Fleet into four Squadrons (besides those that he ranged in the Front, to draw on the Enemies, and to ingage them) and that, while he himself fought with one Squadron that charged him, all the rest of the Enemies Fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second Squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppress: and Amilcar being oppress and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieve both their third and fourth Squadron, and got the Victory.

Charles the Fifth, among other his Precepts to Philip the Second his Son, where he adviseth him concerning War against the Turks, tells him, that in all Battels between them and the Christians, he should never fail to charge the Janisars in the beginning of the Fight, and to ingage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Janisars, who are always reserved intire, in the Rear of the Battel, and in whom the Turk reposeth his greatest confidence; come up in a gross Body, when all the Troups on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carry the Victory before them without resistance. By the same order of fight and reservation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath ever been found, to keep some one or two good Troups to look on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevail in Africk. Atilius the Consul propoundeth intolerable Conditions of Peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made Prisoner.

NOw the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and revictualled their Fleet, set sail for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some forty leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilcar himself as yet staid. From this Head-

Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about fifty English mile from it. There they disimbarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which to ease them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africa side; without which, all Invasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themselves thither; but being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all sorts both by Sea and Land for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the mean while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Consuls should remain with the Army, and that the other should return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome, whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captives, with all the Roman Fleet and Army; except forty Ships, fifteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse that were left with Atilius.

With these Forces, Regulus easily wan some Towns and Places that were unwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came unto Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Bagrada, he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he slew, not without loss of many Souldiers, being driven to use against it such Engines of War as served properly for the assaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Bostar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicil five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse to succour his Country. These (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africa, by weary protraction of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main Fight. They were careful to hold themselves free from necessity of coming to blows: yet had they a great desire to save the Town of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their general purpose, and yet to disturb him in the Siege of Adis, they incamp near unto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an Hill; but thereby they lose the services, both of their Elephants, and of their Horsemen. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discovers, and makes use of it. He assails them in their strength, which they defend a while; but in fine, the Romans prevail, and force them from the place, taking the spoil of their Camp. Following this their good Fortune at the heels, they proceed to * Tunis, a City within sixteen miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

* This City was taken from the Turks by Charles the Fifth, in the year 1536. and was one of the three Keys which he gave in charge to Philip the second his Son to keep safe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africk: Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands, and Cadiz, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip so lost, that he never found them again; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we staid not to pick any Lock, but break open the Doors, and having rifled all, threw it into the Fire.

By the loss of this Battel at Adis, and more especially by the loss of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismaid. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their Misfortunes; invade and spoil their Territory, and force those that inhabit abroad to forsake their Villages and Fields, and to hide themselves within the Walls of Carthage. By reason hereof a great Famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius finds his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out: yet he feared lest it might defend it self until his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the Honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, perswades him to treat of Peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now so couragious and disdainful, that they resolved, either to defend their Liberty, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great Troop of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received near unto Adis, gave it out publickly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for, gives the reason of his Opinion, and in conclusion, being made General of the African Forces, he puts himself into the Field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the Forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberty, Lives, Goods, Wives and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were mis-numbred; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which use the service of mercinary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own Doors.

Xantippus, taking the Field with this Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his Troops upon fair and level ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them Battel. The Romans wondred whence this new Courage of their Enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soon abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorn Hope; that these might, either with Darts and other casting Weapons, drive back the Beasts upon the Enemies, or at least break their Violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end they made their Battels deeper in file than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the less subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed unto the violence of Horse, wherein the Enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one rank, before his Army, which followed them at a reasonable distance: his Horse-men, and some light-armed Foot of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the Wings. The first Onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they break into the Battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battel was helpful. For when the Beasts had spent their force in piercing through a few of the first Ranks, the Squadrons nevertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian Horse, having at the first Encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the Field, began to charge the Roman Battalions in Flank, and put them in great distress; distress; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward, nor yet retire; but had much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered company, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared to have dealt with the Enemy upon equal terms. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiling to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the Enemy, and spent with travel, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these Troops, that open the way to a general Overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full Victory, destroying the whole Roman Army, save two thousand, and taking five hundred Prisoners, together with Atilius the Consul. Of their own they lost no more than eight hundred Mercinaries, which were slain when the Fight began, by two thousand of the Romans, that wheeling about, to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian Trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby Fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her Vassalls, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soever they had been in their proposition of Peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which she never gave nor sold to any mortal man. With what joy these News were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the Vertue of one man hath often brought to pass in the World, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that Sentence of Eurypides, Mens una sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wise mind.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause it is unknown.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consul, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of Prisoners on both sides: giving his Faith to return, if the business were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly perswaded to have the Prisoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where, for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible Death. For this his Constancy and Faith, all Writers highly extol him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obstinate and malicious Enemy; that neither in his Prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his Calamity would have the natural care to preserve himself and others, by yielding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all Wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him, sure it is, that his faithful observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave Speech which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of Prisoners, appears in all reason, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious frowardness, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soon after his Death; wherein the Romans had the worst bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the Authority of all Historians that magnifie him in this point, we are to consider that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extream torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein, otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans deserved to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion to whip almost to death, and then to behead the Captains of their Enemies whom they took, yea, although they were such as had always made fair Wars with them. Wherefore it seems not meet, in reason, that they should cry out against the like tyrannical insolence in others, as if it were lawful only in themselves.

The consideration, both of this misfortune, that rewarded the Pride of Atilius his intolerable Demands, and of the sudden Valour whereinto the Carthaginians fear was changed by meer desperation; calls to remembrance the like Insolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been denied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to add unto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genowaies won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not only drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own Fleet within two miles of Venice it self. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered unto the Genowaies (their State reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blown up with many former Victories, would hearken to no composition, save the yielding of their City and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venetians being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining Power, and assail Doria with such desperate fury, that they break his Fleet, kill Doria himself, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourscore Boats of Padoa, and four thousand Prisoners; recover Chiczza, and all the places taken from them; and following their Victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforceing the Genowaies basely to beg Peace, to their extream dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withal an over-cruel revenge upon the Gantois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their City, Goods, and Estates to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had unadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their City with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished Followers, and enforce him to hide himself under an heap of Straw in a poor Cottage, out of which, with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himself. Such are the fruits of insolency.

How the Affairs of Carthage proſpered after the Victory againſt Atilius: How the Romans having loſt their Fleet by Tempeſt, reſolve to forſake the Seas: The great advantages of a good Fleet in War, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late Victory, all places that had been loſt in Africk, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea ſtands out; before which the Carthaginians ſit down, and aſſail it, but in vain: For the Romans hearing of the loſs of Atilius with their Forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was beſieged, make ready a groſs Army, and tranſport it in a Fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Æmilius, and Ser. Fulvius their Conſuls. At the Promontory of Mercury, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies ſet out on purpoſe, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their coſt. For the Romans took by force an hundred and fourteen of their Fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they ſtaid no longer than to take in their own men that had been beſieged: and this done, they made amain toward Sicil, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this haſty Voyage they deſpiſe the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find Harbour in time, for that the Seaſon threatned ſome violent Storms; which ever hapned between the riſing of Orion, and of the * Dog-ſtar. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus forewarned them of the Weather at hand, and certified them withal, that the South Coaſt of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to ſave themſelves upon ſuch an accident, yet this victorious Nation was perſwaded that the Wind and Seas feared them no leſs than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themſelves. So refuſing to ſtay within ſome Port, as they were adviſed, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their Reputation, after this Victory againſt the Carthaginian Fleet; to take a few worthleſs Towns upon the Coaſt. The mercileſs Winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thruſt headlong on the Rocks, all but fourſcore of three hundred and forty Ships: ſo as their former great Victory was devoured by the Seas, before the Fame thereof recovered Rome.

* There is no part of the World which hath not ſome certain times of outragious weather, beſides their accidental ſtorms. We have upon our Coaſt a Michaelmas Flaw, that ſeldom or never fails. In the Weſt Indies, in the months of Auguſt and September, thoſe moſt forcible Winds which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North Winds, are very fearful: and therefore they that Navigate in thoſe parts, take harbour till thoſe months take end. Charles the Fifth being as ill adviſed in paſſing the Seas toward Algire, in the Winter quarter, contrary to the Counſel of A. Doria, as he was in like unſeaſonable times to continue his Siege before Metz in Lorain, loſt an hundred and forty Ships by Tempeſt, and fifteen Gallies, with all in effect in them, of men, Victuals, Horſes, and Munition: a loſs no leſs great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extream diſhonourable.

The Carthaginians hearing what had hapned, repair all their warlike Veſſels, hoping once again to command the Seas: they are alſo as confident of their Land-forces ſince the Overthrow of Atilius. They ſend Aſdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and forty Elephants, imbarked in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and Fleet he arrives at Lilybæum; where he begins to vex the Partiſans of Rome. But adverſity doth not diſcourage the Romans; They build in three months (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty Ships; with which, and the remainder of their late Shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chief City of the Africans in Sicil, and ſurround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garriſon therein, return to Rome.

Very deſirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: to which purpoſe they imployed C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Conſuls. But theſe wrought no wonders. Some ſpoil they made upon the Coaſts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were firſt ſet upon the Sands, and like to have periſhed near unto the leſſer Syrtes, where they were fain to heave all over board, that ſo they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their paſſage from Panormus towards Italy, they loſt an hundred and fifty of their Ships by foul weather. A greater diſcouragement never Nation had; the God of the Wars favoured them no more, than the God of the Waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now loſt, beſides what they loſt in fight, four hundred and ſix Ships and Gallies, with all the Munition and Souldiers tranſported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perſwaded them to give over their Navigation, and their Fight by Sea, and to ſend only a Land-army into Sicil, under L. Cæcilius, and C. Furius, their Conſuls. Theſe they tranſported in ſome three-ſcore ordinary Paſſage-boats, by the Straights of Meſſana, that are not above a mile and a half broad from land to land. In like ſort the Overthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occaſioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them leſs cholerick againſt the Carthaginians than before; ſo that for two years after they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and champian Countries. But this late reſolution of forſaking the Seas laſted not long. For it was impoſſible for them to ſuccour thoſe places which they held in Sicil, without a Navy, much leſs to maintain the War in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to ſend Forces from Meſſana to Egeſta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extream Weſt parts of Sicil, making ſometimes a march of above an hundred and forty Engliſh mile by land, which could not be performed with an Army, and the proviſions that follow it, in leſs than fourteen days, the Carthaginians would paſs it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have of that great advantage of tranſporting Armies by water, between Canutus and Edmond Ironſide. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navy and Army, and could not prevail againſt London, ſuddenly imbarked; and ſailing to the Weſt, landed in Dorſetſhire, ſo drawing Edmond and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again ſhipt his men, and entred the Severn, making Edmond to march after him to the ſuccour of Worceſterſhire, by him greatly ſpoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he ſailed back again to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and ſpoiled where he pleaſed, ere ſuccour could arrive. And this was not the leaſt help, which the Netherlands have had againſt the Spaniards, in the defence of their Liberty, that being Maſters of the Sea, they could paſs their Army from place to place unwearied and entire, with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their Enemies have been able to do it. Of this, an inſtance or two. The Count Maurice of Naſſau, now living, one of the greateſt Captains, and of the worthieſt Princes, Princes, that either the preſent or proceeding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carried his Army by Sea, with forty Cannons, to Breda: making countenance either to beſiege Boſſleduc, or Gertreuiden-Berg; which the Enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers and Victuals. But as ſoon as the Wind ſerved, he ſuddenly ſet ſail, and arriving in the mouth of the Meuze, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Yſſel, and ſate down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, above fourſcore mile, and over many great Rivers with their Cannon and Carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spaniſh Army had overcome this wearieſome March, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice making countenance to ſail up the Rhine, changed his courſe in the night; and ſailing down the Stream, he was ſet down before Hulſt in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he alſo took, before the Spaniſh Army could return. Laſtly, the Spaniſh Army was no ſooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good Fleet, having fortified Hulſt, ſet ſail again, and preſented himſelf before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and maſtred it.

And to ſay the truth, it is impoſſible for any maritime Country, not having the Coaſts admirably fortified, to defend it ſelf againſt a powerful Enemy that is maſter of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England ſhould be an example. Let it therefore be ſuppoſed, that King Philip the ſecond, had fully reſolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the year 1589. from preſenting Don Antonio, King of Portugal, before the Gates of Lisborn; and that he would have kept off the Engliſh, by power of his Land-forces, as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armada, by the Fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him to prepare an Army, that ſhould be able to reſiſt our eleven thouſand. But where ſhould this his Army have been beſtowed? If about Lysborn, then would it have been eaſie unto the Engliſh, to take, ranſack, and burn the Town of Groin, and to waſte the Country round about it. For the great and threatning preparations, of the Earl of Altemira, the Marqueſs of Saralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the haſty levy of eight thouſand, under the Earl of Andrada, ſerve to more effect, than the increaſe of honour to Sir John Norris and his Aſſociates: conſidering that the Engliſh charged theſe at Puente de Burgos, and paſſing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flancked with Shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, took their Camp, took their Generals Standard with the Kings Arms, and purſued them over all the Country, which they fired. If a Royal Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the War in Galicia; I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the Guard of Portugal, and make haſte to the defence of their St. Jago, whoſe Temple was not far from the danger. But had they held their firſt reſolution, as knowing that Sir John Norris his main intent was to bring Don Antonio with an Army into his Kingdom, whither coming ſtrong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed, could they have hindred his landing in Portugal? Did not he land at Penicha, and march over the Country to Lysborn, ſix days journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promiſes failed) paſs along by the River of Lysborn to Caſcaliz, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But theſe, though no more than an handful, yet were they Engliſh men. Let us conſider of the matter it ſelf, what another Nation might do, even againſt England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a Fleet, if we had none. This queſtion, Whether an invading Army may be reſiſted at their landing upon the Coaſt of England, were there no Fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his Obſervations upon Cæſars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon ſuppoſition; in abſence of our Shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more ſafe and eaſie courſe to defend all the Coaſt of England, than to ſuffer an Enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the beſt way to keep our Enemy from treading upon our Ground: wherein if we fail, then muſt we ſeek to make him wiſh that he had ſtaid at his own Home. In ſuch a caſe, if it ſhould happen, our Judgments are to weigh many particular circumſtances that belong not unto this Diſcourſe. But making the Queſtion general and poſitive, Whether England, without help of her Fleet, be able to debar an Enemy from landing? I hold that it is unable ſo to do, and therefore I think it moſt dangerous to make the adventure. For the incouragement of a firſt Victory to an Enemy, and the diſcouragement of being beaten to the Invaded, may draw after it a moſt perilous conſequence.

It is true, that the Marſhal Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his wanting Forces, wherewith to have kept the Frontier of Guienne, they of the Proteſtant Religion, after the Battel of Moncounter, entred that Country, and gathered great ſtrength and relief thence; for if the King (ſaith he) would have given me but reaſonable means, j euſe bien garde a Monſieur l' Admiral, de faire boire ſes Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his Horſes in the River of Garonne. Monſieur de Langey, on the contrary ſide, prefers the not fighting upon a Frontier with an invading Enemy, and commends the delay; which courſe the Conſtable of France held againſt the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverſe conſideration to be had, between ſuch a Country as France is, ſtrengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of Invaſions upon firm land, that theſe great Captains ſpeak, whoſe entrances cannot be uncertain. But our queſtion is, of an Army to be tranſported over Sea, and to be landed again in an Enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Invader. Hereunto I ſay, That ſuch an Army cannot be reſiſted on the Coaſt of England, without a Fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the Coaſt of France, or any other Country; except every Creek, Port, or ſandy Bay, had a powerful Army in each of them to make oppoſition. For let his whole ſuppoſition be granted; That Kent is able to furniſh twelve thouſand Foot; and that thoſe twelve thouſand be laid in the three beſt landing places within that Country, to wit, three thouſand at Margat, three thouſand at the Neſſe, and ſix thouſand at Foulkſton, that is ſomewhat equally diſtant from them both; as alſo that two of theſe Troops (unleſs ſome other order be thought more fit) be directed to ſtrengthen the third, when they ſhall ſee the Enemies Fleet to bend towards it: I ſay, that notwithſtanding this proviſion, if the Enemy, ſetting ſail from the Iſle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long Boats at their Sterns, shall arrive by dawn of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Army on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat (twenty and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to do it, who are nearer by more than half the way? seeing that the Enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or four hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else give them so much to do, that they shall be glad to send for help to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat; whereby those places will be left bare. Now let us suppose that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the Enemy can be ready to disimbarque his Army, so that he shall find it unsafe to land in the face of so many prepared to withstand him; yet must we believe that he will play the best of his own game; and (having liberty to go which way he list) under covert of the night, set sail towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downs, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to do it. Yea, the like may be said of Weymouth, Purbeck, Pool, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily outrun the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne volent point en poste; Armies neither fly, nor run post, saith a Marshal of France. And I know it to be true, that a Fleet of Ships may be seen at Sun set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, , whereas an Army of Foot shall not be able to march it in six days. Again, when those Troops lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vain, after a Fleet of Ships, they will at length sit down in the mid-way, and leave all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; That the invading Enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him: yet it cannot be doubted but that when the choice of all our trained Bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbury, in the year 1588.) to attend the Person of the Prince, and for the defence of the City of London: they that remain to guard the Coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Army like unto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught us by experience, what to think in such a case. There are not many Islands in the World, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being every where hard of access; having no good Harbour wherein to shelter a Navy of Friends; and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an Enemies Boat. Yet when Emanuel de Salvia, and Monsieur de Chattes, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or six thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquess of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquess having shewed himself in the Road of Angra, did set sail ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, far distant from thence, where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vain, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strosse, slain the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French Prisoners murthered in cold Blood, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquess his hands: Therefore it is not like that they were slow in carrying relief to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste from Margat to the Nesse, and back again, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one half, when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble Ships of Spain.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good Fleet, which neither Foot nor Horse is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, unless it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a Fleet of equal or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alleadged against this: which example moves me no way to think that a large Coast may be defended against a strong Fleet. I landed those English in Fayal my self, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I find an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may, by a civil interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any Honour; but rather an opinion, that the Enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no Honour could be due unto it. There were indeed some which were in that Voyage, who advised me not to undertake it: and I hearkned unto them somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired me to reserve the Title of such an Exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to understand the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a Coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did, yea, without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea, even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But without fearing any imputation of rashness, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that business, than of safety. For I thought it to belong unto the Honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Islanders should not think any advantage great enough, against a Fleet set forth by Queen Elizabeth: and further, I was unwilling that some Low-Country Captains, and others, not of mine own Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would have been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their help I was driven to turn tail. Therefore I took with me none but men assured, Commanders of mine own Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, Voluntiers, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Scot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henry Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captain Laurence Kemis, Captain William Morgan, and others, such as well understood themselves and the Enemy: by whose help, with Gods favour, I made good the Enterprise I undertook. As for the working of the Sea, the steepness of the Cliffs, and other troubles, that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or six Companies of the Enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the Wall, whereon their Musquetiers lay lay on the reſt for us, and won the place of them without any great loſs. This I could have done with leſs danger, ſo that it ſhould not have ſerved for example of a rule, that failed even in this example: but the reaſons before alledged (together with other reaſons well known to ſome of the Gentlemen above named, though more private than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the ſhorter courſe, having it ſtill in mine own power to fall off when I ſhould think it meet. It is eaſily ſaid, that the Enemy was more than a Coward (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie ſuch a ſmall piece of ſervice, by ſeeking to prove him better, whom had I thought equal to mine own Followers, I would otherwiſe have dealt with. But for ſo much as concerns the Propoſition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember, that the ſame Enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the ſhore; that he ſought how to ſtop us in place of his advantage; that many of our men were ſlain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was ſhot in that march; and that ſuch, as (thinking all danger to be paſt, when we had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Town, were driven by him, to forſake the pace of a Man of War, and betake themſelves to an haſty trot.

For end of this digreſſion, I hope that this queſtion ſhall never come to tryal; his Majeſties many moveable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the Engliſh will no leſs diſdain, than any Nation under Heaven can do, to be beaten upon their own ground, or elſewhere, by a forraign Enemy, yet to entertain thoſe that ſhall aſſail us, with their own Beef in their Bellies, and before they eat of our Kentiſh Capons, I take it to be the wiſeſt way. To do which, his Majeſty, after God, will imploy his good Ships on the Sea, and not truſt to any intrenchment upon the Shore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt again to get the maſtery of the Seas. The Victory of Cæcilius the Roman Conſul at Panormus. The Siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entred Lilybæum at pleaſure, in deſpight of the Roman Fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to ſtop the paſſage of good Ships. The Romans, by reaſon of grievous loſſes received under Claudius and Junius their Conſuls, abandon the Seas again.

WHen without a ſtrong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impoſſible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elſewhere: they reſolved once again, notwithſtanding their late miſadventures, to ſtrengthen their Fleet and ſhips of War. So cauſing fifty new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Souldiers) to the new Conſuls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other ſide, Aſdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reaſon of the Shipwrack which they had lately ſuffered, partly by reaſon of the Overthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leſs daring than they had been in the beginning of the War; and withal, that one of the Conſuls was returned into Italy, with the one half of the Army; and that Cæcilius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian Forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Conſul was better adviſed. For when Aſdrubal had made his approaches ſomewhat near the Town, Cæcilius cauſed a deep Trench to be cut a good diſtance without the Ditch of the City: between which and his Trench he left ground ſufficient to embattel a Legion of his Souldiers. To theſe he gave order that they ſhould advance themſelves, and paſs over the new Trench, till ſuch time as the African Elephants were thruſt upon them. From thoſe Beaſts he commanded them to retire, by ſlow degrees, till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new Trench, which they could by no means paſs. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a ſtand, they were ſo gawled and beaten, both by thoſe Souldiers that were on the inſide of the Trench, and by thoſe that lay in the Trench it ſelf, that being inraged by their many Wounds, they brake back furiouſly upon their own Foot-men, and utterly diſordered them. Cæcilius eſpying this advantage, ſallyed with all the Force he had, and charging the other Troops, that ſtood embattelled, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great ſlaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this Victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new Fleet of two hundred Sail, which they ſent into Sicil, to give end to that War, that had now laſted fourteen years. With this Fleet and Army the Romans reſolve to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) ſave Drepanum, that was near adjoyning. They ſit down before it, and poſſeſs themſelves of all the places of advantage near unto it, eſpecially of ſuch as command the Haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They alſo beat to the ground ſix Towers of defence, and by forceable Engines weaken ſo many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to deſpair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a Man of War. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious ſallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that poſſibly could be made. He hath in Garriſon (beſides the Citizens) ten thouſand Souldiers; among which there are certain Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conſpire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like Treaſon, ſaved Agrigentum. Himilco uſeth the help of Alexon, to aſſure the hired Souldiers; and imployeth Hannibal to appeaſe the Troops of the Gauls, which did waver, and had ſent their Agents to the Enemy. All promiſe conſtancy and truth; ſo that the Traitors being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman Camp as Fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deſerve their Bread. In the mean while, a ſupply of ten thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal, the Son of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in deſpight of all reſiſtance, entred the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the beſieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies (thereto perſwaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) reſolve to ſet upon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the Siege, or (at leaſt) to take from them, or ſet on fire, their Engines of battery. The attempt is preſently made, and purſued sued to the uttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extream difficulty defend their Engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the State of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the service, and having received his dispatch, sails with one Gally to Ægusa, a little Island near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gally, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the Water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the Shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he set sail, and shipping his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of steerage, and himself expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then finding himself out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those days: and yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other Weapons of fire to kill a far off, the adventure which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious Man of War will not fear to pass by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of Wind, no, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouths against him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sweden were at War; our East-land Fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the Subjects of his Enemies, and he threatned to sink their Ships if they came through the Streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a Ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure; and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could to stop them or sink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only pass out with little loss, but did beat down with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour, which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the Fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any Wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibility to master it, otherwise than by Famine, laid his Cannon on the bank of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impossible for the least Boat to pass by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good Market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extream dear in Antwerp, passed in Boats of ten or twelve Tun, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it, when a strong Westerly Wind, and a Tide of flood favoured them; as also with a contrary Wind, and an ebbing Water, they turned back again: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvelous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not us in the year 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with four Demi-cannons within point blanck, from six in the morning till twelve at noon. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good Ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the Ships are driven to turn upon a bow line towards it, wanting all help of Wind and Tide; there, and in such places is it of great use, and fearful: otherwise not.

But to return to our adventurous Rhodian: He arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the Estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choak the Channel, and for that purpose, fill many Merchants Ships with great stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tides clears it again in part: but they grounded so many of those great bellied Boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heap, like a ragged Island, in the passage. Hereby it came to pass, that a Carthaginian Gally taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran her self a ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brave Rhodian, thinking to enter as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him; he findes what she is, both by her form, and by her swiftness: and being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her: But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worn with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a Tempest, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they overtop the Walls of Lilybæum, were over-turned. A Greek Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellows of a Tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistless, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brasen Heads of the battering Rams. Hereupon, despair and weariness hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long Siege, to starve the Defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consul. He arrives at Messana, and marcheth over land to Lilybæum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This service the Captains and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consul imbarks his Troops, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent Man of War, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad than to be inclosed. Herewithal he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their Valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head head of his Fleet. Having ſufficiently encouraged his men, he thruſts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Conſul, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremoſt Gallies, that he might now marſhall them for defence. Hereupon ſome row backward, ſome forward, in great confuſion. Adherbal finds and follows his advantage, and forceth the Conſul into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himſelf, having the land on his back: hoping thereby to keep himſelf from being incompaſſed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, ſo ſtreighened, as he could not turn himſelf any way from his Enemies, nor range himſelf in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of reſiſtance, keeping the Shore on his left hand, he thruſt out of the Bay with thirty Gallies beſides his own, and ſo fled away: all the reſt of his Fleet, to the number of ninety and four Ships, were taken or ſunk by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this ſervice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiſcretion and flight, as much diſgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithſtanding this great loſs, armed threeſcore Gallies, with which they ſend away L. Junius, their Conſul, to take charge of their buſineſs in Sicil. Junius arrives at Meſſana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman Fleet, thoſe excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twenty Gallies he had; and beſides theſe, he had gotten together almoſt eight hundred Ships of burthen, which were laden with all neceſſary proviſions for the Army. With this great Fleet he arrives at Syracuſe, where he ſtaies a while; partly to take in Corn; partly, to wait for ſome that were too ſlow of ſail, to keep company with him along from Meſſana. In the mean time, he diſpatcheth away towards Lilybæum, his Quæſtors or Treaſurers; to whom he commits the one half of his Victuallers, with ſome Gallies for their convoy.

Adherbal was not careleſs, after his late Victory: but ſtudied how to uſe it to the beſt advantage. The Ships and Priſoners that he had taken, he ſent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered thirty to Carthalo, who had threeſcore and ten more under his own charge, and ſent him to try what good might be done againſt the Roman Fleet, in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to this direction, Carthalo ſuddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping of in the beſieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own againſt another Fleet. So he chargeth them, boards and takes ſome, and fires the reſt. The Roman Camp takes alarm, and haſtens to the reſcue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand; who ſallies out at the ſame time, and putting the Romans in great diſtreſs, gives Carthalo good leiſure to go through with his Enterpriſe.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South Coaſt of Sicil, deviſing how to work miſchief to the Enemy: wherein Fortune preſented him with a fair occaſion, which he wiſely managed. He was advertiſed by his Scouts, that they had deſcried near at hand, a great Fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſels. Theſe were the Victuallers, which the Conſul Junius, more haſtily than providently, had ſent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to hear of their coming, for he and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late Victories. Accounting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a Fleet, likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight, but were glad to ſeek ſhelter in an open Road, full of Rocks, under covert of a poor Town, belonging to their Party; that could help to ſave them only from the preſent danger, by lending them Engines and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that aſſailed them: Carthalo therefore having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the reſt, that could not long ride under thoſe Rocks, but would be forced, by any great change of Wind, either to put out into the deep, or to ſave their men how they could, by taking land, with the loſs of all their Shipping. Whileſt he was buſied in this care, the Conſul Junius drew near, and was diſcovered. Againſt him Carthalo makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Conſul had neither means to fly, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creek, thinking no danger ſo great as that of the Enemy. The Carthaginian ſeeing this, betakes himſelf to a ſtation between the two Roman Fleets, where he watcheth to ſee which of them would firſt ſtir, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelf into the Sea. So as now all the three Fleets were on the South Coaſt of Sicil, between the Promontory of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the Wind ſtormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of Tempeſt, and their ſigns, finding belike ſome ſwelling Billow (for ſo we do in the Weſt of England, before a Southerly Storm) haſted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themſelves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrails of their Beaſts, their Sooth-ſayers being all Land-prophets, were ſuddenly overtaken with a boiſterous South Wind, and all their Gallies forced againſt the Rocks, and utterly wrackt.

This Calamity ſo diſcouraged the Romans, that they reſolved again to forſake the Seas, and truſt only to the ſervice of their Legions upon firm ground. But ſuch a reſolution cannot long hold. Either they muſt be ſtrong at Sea, or elſe they muſt not make War in an Iſland, againſt thoſe that have a mighty Fleet. Yet are they to be excuſed, in regard of the many great Calamities which they had ſuffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient Vertue of the Spaniards. We ſeldom or never find that any Nation hath endured ſo many miſadventures and miſeries as the Spaniards have done in their Indian Diſcoveries. Yet perſiſting in their Enterpriſes, with an invincible conſtancy, they have annexed to their Kingdom ſo many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers paſt. Tempeſts and Shipwracks, Famine, Overthrows, Mutinies, Heat and Cold, Peſtilence, and all manner of Diſeaſes, both old and new, together with extream Poverty, and want of all things needful, have been the Enemies, wherewith every one of their moſt noble Diſcoverers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many years have paſſed over ſome of their heads, in the ſearch of not ſo many leagues: yea, more than one or two, have ſpent their Labour, their Wealth, and their Lives, in ſearch of a golden Kingdom, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their firſt ſetting forth. All which notwithſtanding, the third, fourth, and fifth Undertakers have not been diſheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with thoſe

Trea-

Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enjoy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The City of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar; who stoutly holds War with them five years. The Romans having emptied their common Treasury, build a new Fleet, at the charges of private men. The great Victory at Sea of Luctatius the Consul; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave Peace. The Conditions of the Peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful, to supply with all industry, by Land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the Siege of Lilybæum, and seek to make sure to themselves all Places, whither the Enemies Ships could not bring Relief. The Consul Junius, to cure the wound of Dishonour, which he had received, bethought him what Enterprize to undertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina, which was the faireſt and richeſt of all the Island; and of these, by Cunning or Treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated between Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit Place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making Roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottom, (both which Places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the 18*th*. year of this War, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, sirnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a Fleet and Army, who sailing to the Coasts of Italy, did throughly repay the Spoils which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all wasted and destoyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil, and finding there no walled City in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infest the Romans, he occupied a piece of Ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himself between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The Place that Amilcar had seized upon, was not only very strong by Scituation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunity, to scour all the Coast of Italy with his Fleet, wasting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard work, lying near unto Panormus, where in three years abode he did many notable Acts, though not of much consequence, for that the Enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himself and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a strange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottom of the Mountain, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveyed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the midst of the ascent, ere the Enemy knew of it. By this it came to pass, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountain, were straightly held (as it were) besieged. And no less was Amilcar himself restrained, by both of these Garisons, and such as came to relieve them. There he found them pastime about two years nigre; hoping still to weary out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those Quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the prosecuting of this business at Eryx. Wherein it seems true (as Hannibal, in Livie, spake unto Scipio) that the Affairs of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the War, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses, partly upon confidence of their Land-forces, which they held resistless; Amilcar, with a small Army, had so well acquitted himself, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the tryal of five years War, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equal, if not superior, to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been devised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warrior, no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a Fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extream difficulty was found. The common Treasury was exhausted, and the cost was not little, that was requisite unto such an Enterprize. Wherefore there was no other way left, than to lay the burden upon private Purses. Divers of the principal Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought so well, that they, whose ability would not serve to do the like, joyned with some others, and laying their money together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another, with condition to be repaid, when the War was finished. By this voluntary Contribution, they made and furnished 200 new Quinqueremes, taking for their pattern, that excellent swift rowing Galley which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was shewed before. The charge of this Fleet was committed to C. Luctatius Catulus, who pass'd with the same into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, endeavouring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertised that the Carthaginian Fleet was at hand, and being mindful of the late losses which his Predecessors had received, he was careful to put himself in order, against their arrival.

Liv. Dec. 3. l. 10.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian Fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in Picture, exceedingly formal, and skilful in the Art of seeming reverend. How his Reputation was first bred, I do not find, but it was upheld by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himself. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new Enterprizes, and therewithal an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by every loss received. More particularly, he was gracious among the People, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithal such hatred, as turned it all to their great loss. He had ere this been employed against the Numidians, and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers, than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly Enemies, to his own great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, duct, than by his malicious counſel, when, having ſhewed himſelf an unworthy Captain, he betook himſelf to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Hiſtories, as a temperate man, and one that ſtudied how to preſerve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deſerved of his own Countrey, it will appear hereafter: how beneficial he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in his preſent Voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miſerable neceſſity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that Peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furniſhed his Navy, with all needful Proviſions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexterity in making preparation was the beſt of his qualities) but he had neither been careful in training his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Galleys with ſtout Fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian Fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſs force of tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or elſe was ſent forth well inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſail to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his Ships of their lading: and having thus lightned himſelf, he meant to take aboard ſome part of the Land-army, together with Amilcar himſelf, by whoſe help he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make the Enemy repent of his new Adventure to Sea. This was a good courſe, if it could have been performed. But Catulus uſed all poſſible diligence, to prevent the execution of this deſign: not becauſe he was informed of the Enemies purpoſe, but for that he knew it to be the beſt for them, and for that he feared no danger ſo greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian Fleet was deſcried; yet he rather choſe to fight with the Enemy, that had the wind of him, than to ſuffer this Convoy to paſs along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno ſhould have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exerciſed his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Galleys of all unneceſſary burthen; and he had taken aboard the choice men of the Roman Land-ſouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the firſt Encounter, were utterly broken and defeated; having 50 of their Galleys ſtemmed and ſunk, and 70 taken, wherein were few leſs than 10000 men, that were all made Priſoners: the reſt, by a ſudden change of wind, eſcaping to the Iſle of Hieroneſus.

The ſtate of Carthage, utterly diſcouraged by this change of Fortune, knew not whereon to reſolve. Means to repair their Fleet in any time there were none left; their beſt men of War by Sea were conſumed; and Amilcar, upon whoſe valour and judgment the honour and ſafety of the Common-wealth reſted, was now ſurrounded by his Enemies in Sicil, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make a diſpatch unto Amilcar himſelf, and authorize him to take what courſe ſhould ſeem beſt unto his excellent wiſdom; leaving all concluſions to his election and ſole counſel.

Amilcar, whom no Adverſity, accompanied with the leaſt hope or poſſibility of recovery, had ever vanquiſhed, looking over every promiſe, true or falſe, that the preſent time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) reſolved to make tryal, whether his neceſſity might be compounded upon any reaſonable terms. He therefore ſent to Lutatius the Conſul an Overture of Peace: who conſidering it well, gathered ſo many Arguments from the preſent Poverty of the Roman State, waſted beyond expectation in the former War, that he willingly hearkned unto it. So, in concluſion, an accord was made, but with proviſion, That it ſhould hold none otherwiſe, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The Conditions were: Firſt, That the Carthaginians ſhould clearly abandon the Iſle of Sicil. Secondly, That they ſhould never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuſe, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, That they ſhould ſet at liberty, and ſend back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they held Priſoners, without ranſom. Laſtly, That they ſhould pay unto the Romans two thouſand and two hundred Talents; which make, after 600 French Crowns to the Talent, thirteen hundred and twenty thouſand Crowns: the ſame to be delivered within 20 years next following.

Theſe Articles were ſent to Rome, where they were not throughly approved: but ten Commiſſioners were ſent into Sicil, to make perfect the Agreement. Theſe Commiſſioners added a thouſand Talents to the former Sum; and required a ſhorter time of payment. Further alſo, they took order, that the Carthaginians ſhould not only depart out of Sicil it ſelf, but ſhould alſo withdraw their Companies out of all the other Iſlands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole Intereſt therein.

Such was the end of the firſt Punick War, that had laſted about twenty four years without interminſion; in which time the Romans had loſt, by Fight or Shipwrack, about ſeven hundred Quinqueremes, and the Carthaginians, about five hundred: the greatneſs of which loſſes, doth ſerve to prove the greatneſs both of theſe two Cities, and of the War it ſelf; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in general, did ſhew themſelves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the moſt worthy Captain.

Chap. II.

Of divers Actions passing between the first and second Punick Wars.

§. I.

Of the cruel War begun between the Carthaginians and their own Mercinaries.

THE Romans, having partly by Force, and partly by Compoſition, thruſt the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Iſlands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leiſure to help themſelves in a following War, than cauſe to hold themſelves contented with the preſent Peace. It is a true Rule, Quòd leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That Laws are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the Anſwer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or elſe had forgotten to follow it, in this weighty buſineſs. For when one of Privernum, after a Rebellion, defending in the Senate the Cauſe of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What Peace the Romans might hope for, or aſſure themſelves of, if they quitted their preſent advantage over them; he anſwered in theſe words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; ſi malam, haud diuturnam; if the Peace be good and faithful that you give us, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this Anſwer, the Senate, at that time, gave ſuch approbation, that it was ſaid, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; an credi poſſe, ullum populum, aut hominem denique in ea conditione, cujus eum pœniteat, diutius quàm neceſſe ſit manſurum? That it was the ſpeech of a manly, and a free man; for who could believe, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an overburdened eſtate, than meer neceſſity did enforce? Now if the Romans themſelves could make this judgement, of thoſe Nations, who had little elſe, beſides their manly reſolution, to defend their liberty; ſurely, they groſly flattered themſelves, in preſuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior unto themſelves, would ſit down any longer by the loſs and diſhonour received, than until they could recover their Legs, and the ſtrength, which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But Occaſion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper proweſs or vertue; with-held the Tempeſt from the Romans for a time, and turned it moſt fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themſelves.

Q. Curt. l. 4.

For after that the firſt Punick War was ended; Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence moſt conveniently the Army might be tranſported into Africk: the care of which buſineſs he committed unto Geſco, to whom, as to a man of approved ſufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Geſco had an eſpecial conſideration of the great Sums, wherein Carthage was indebted unto theſe Mercinaries; and, withal, of the great diſability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wiſeſt way, to ſend them over (as it were) by handfuls, a few at a time; that ſo the firſt might have their diſpatch, and be gone, ere the ſecond or third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perſwade any ſmall number, lodged within ſo great a City as Carthage, unto ſome ſuch reaſonable compoſition, as the preſent emptineſs of the common Treaſury did require: ſo that the firſt might have been friendly diſcharged, and a good preſident left unto the ſecond and third, whilſt their dis-junction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, ſome that would be contented to gratifie the publick State, by remitting a great part of their own due: and hoped by ſuch an example, to draw all the multitude to the like Agreement and Capitulation. So they detained the firſt and ſecond comers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increaſed, and many diſorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much diſquieted the City, not accuſtomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to ſome other Place where they might be leſs troubleſom. This muſt be done by ſome colourable words of perſwaſion: for their number was already ſo great, that it was not ſafe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is deviſed, that they ſhould all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: receiving every one a piece of Gold, to bear his charges in the mean while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers begin to diſlodge; leaving behind them their Wives, their Children, and all their Baggage, as meaning ſhortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their Pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compel them to truſs up their Fardels, that they might have no occaſion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their Goods; and there lay waiting for news of their fellows arrival, and their own Pay. Buſineſs they had none to do, and therefore might eaſily be drawn to mutiny: the whole argument of their Diſcourſe inclining them to nothing elſe. Their daily talk was, how rich they ſhould be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to every ſingle ſhare; and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find moſt reaſon to increaſe creaſe their demands, to the very higheſt, even beyond their due. No part of their long ſervice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promiſes of their Captains, leading them forth to any dangerous Fight, were called to mind, as ſo many Obligations, not to be cancelled, without ſatisfying their expectation by ſome unordinary largeſs.

Thus the time paſſeth away, until the whole Army being arrived and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the accompt. Now is the day come wherein they ſhall all be made rich; eſpecially if they can hold together in maintaining ſtoutly the common Cauſe. So think they all; and aſſemble themſelves to hear what good news this Meſſenger had brought: with a full reſolution to help his Memory, in caſe he ſhould happen to forget any part of the many Promiſes made unto them; all which were to be conſidered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the Poverty of Carthage; tells them how great a ſum of Money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the exceſſive charges, whereat the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally, deſires them to hold themſelves contented with part of their Pay, and out of the Love which they bare unto the City, to remit the reſt. Few of them underſtood his diſcourſe: for the Carthaginian Army was compoſed of ſundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different Languages. Yet they ſtared upon him, and were (as I think) little pleaſed with his very Geſture. But when ſuch as conceived the whole tenour of his Speech, had informed the reſt what cold comfort he brought; they were all inraged, and fared like mad men, ſo that nothing would ſerve to appeaſe them. Hanno would fain have aſſwaged their Fury, but he knew not how: for he leſs underſtood their diſſonant loud noiſes, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of many Countries, that have no one Language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither eaſily ſtirred up to mutiny, nor eaſily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The beſt that Hanno can do, is to uſe the help of Interpreters and Meſſengers. But theſe Interpreters miſtake his meaning; ſome for want of skill; others of ſet purpoſe, and ſuch as deliver his Errands in the worſt ſenſe, are beſt believed. Finally, they think themſelves much abuſed by the Carthaginians, and reſolve to demand their own in peremptory terms at a nearer diſtance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as far as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they incamp.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own error. It is a good rule:

Curandum inprimis, ne magna injuria fiat
Fortibus & miſeris:

Have ſpecial care, that valiant Poverty
Be not oppreſt with too great injury.

But this proud City having neglected the rule, hath alſo been careleſs in providing to ſecure her ſelf againſt the inconvenience that might follow. She had ſuffered the whole Multitude, whereunto ſhe was like to give cauſe of diſcontent, to joyn it ſelf into one body, when the ſeveral Troops might eaſily have been diſperſed: ſhe hath turned out of her Gates, the Wives, Children, and Goods of theſe poor men, which had ſhe retained in ſhew of kindneſs, ſhe might have uſed them as Hoſtages for her own ſafety; and by imploying a miſerable Penny-father in her Negotiation with Men of War; ſhe hath weakned the Reputation of her braveſt Captains, that might beſt have ſerved to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilcar had no deſire to be uſed as an inſtrument in defrauding his own Souldiers of their Wages: eſpecially, conſidering that as he beſt could bear witneſs of their Merits, ſo was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanno, with his Complices, who at this very time was a bitter Enemy to Amilcar, had the boldneſs to impoſe the blame of his own wretched Counſel, upon the liberal promiſes made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wiſely, in ſuffering thoſe that maligned him to have the managing of their own Plot, and to deal the Cards which themſelves had ſhuffled. This they continued to do as fooliſhly as they had at firſt begun. They furniſh a Market at Tunis for the Souldiers, whom they ſuffered to buy what they liſt, and at what price they liſt. They ſend ever and anon ſome of their Senators into the Camp; who promiſe to ſatisfie all demands, as far forth as it ſhould be poſſible. And thus, by ſhifting from one extream to another, they make the Souldiers underſtand into what fear the City was driven; which cannot but add much inſolency to the paſſions already ſtirred up.

This ſudden change of Weather, and the true cauſe of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon grows wiſe, and finding the Seaſon fit, labours to make a great Harveſt. Money muſt be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have loſt their Horſes in the publick ſervice of the State. The State ſhall pay for them. They had lived ſome years, by making hard ſhift, without receiving their allowance of Victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not Meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the Ships did bring in Proviſion, or their Captain direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ſerve. They ſaid that they had been ſometimes driven to buy; and that (ſince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their Proviſion, during the whole time, and according to the deareſt price that Wheat had born, whileſt the War laſted. Such are now the demands of theſe Mutiners; who might eaſily have been ſatisfied with far leſs Charges, and far more Honour, by receiving their due at the firſt. But now they make no end of craving. For whileſt the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-Money, the Souldiers have deviſed many more tricks whereby to extort a greater ſum of money, without all regard of ſhame. Since therefore no good end could be found of theſe Controverſies, which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, ſhould be choſen by the Souldiers to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army condeſcended, and made choice of Geſco: partly out of good liking to him, who had ſhewed himſelf at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, eſpecially when they were to be tranſported into Africk: partly out of a diſlike which they had conceived of Amilcar, for that he had not viſited them in all this buſie time. So Geſco comes among them, and to pleaſe them the better, comes not without Money, which might give better countenance to his Proceedings, than barren Eloqence had done to the Negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first of all, the Captains, and then the several Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; advising them temperately concerning the present, and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained them, and would always be mindful of their good services. After this he began to put hand to his Purse: offering to give them their whole Pay in hand, and then after to consider of other Reckonings, at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet pass, if two seditious Ringleaders of the Multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a sturdy Fellow, and audacious, but a Slave; that in the late War had fled from a Roman whom he served, and therefore stood in fear, lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be whipt and crucified. This Wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raising such Troubles as might serve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himself one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been so forward in stirring up the Tumult, as he could not choose but fear, lest his own Death should be made an example to deter others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Country-men the Africans, telling them, that they were in far worse condition than either the Gauls, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any foreign Mercinaries. For (saith he) these our Companions have no more to do, than to receive their Wages, and so get them gone: but we that are to stay behind in Africa, shall be called to another manner of account when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home Beggers, rather than loaden with the Money, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. Yea are not ignorant how tyrannically these our haughty Masters of Carthage do raign over us. They think it reasonable that our Lives and Goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times been accustomed to take away from us, even without apparent cause, as it were, to declare their Soveraignty: what will they now do, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as Free-men, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? Ye all do know that it were a very shame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of War as any other men, we should now stand quaking like Slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithstanding ye may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners as soon as our Fellows are gone: in regard of whom, they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced Countenance. Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and fear us. Their Hatred will shew it self, when their Fear is once past, unless we now take our time, and whilest we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly, that their Hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their Strength consisteth in Money, wherewithall they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither Money nor Friends. The best Army that ever served them, whereof we are no small part, lies at their Gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected, for were our Swords once drawn, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whether can they send for help? The case it self is plain, but we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joyning with them against our Fellows, yea, by offering to forgive unto them all our Wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to punish our Faults already committed. He is worthily a wretched Slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters Love, nor courage to attempt his own Liberty.

By such perswasions Matho wins the African Souldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of Money as of quarrel; which he that seeks will not miss to find. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole Stipend presently, but referred their other demands for Horses and Victuals, to some other more convenient time; they break into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this Tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more Fuel to the Fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a shower of Stones flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath been said already by these good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only throw, throw.

Now the Rebellion begins to take form. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common Cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himself upon their Fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principal men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while he works with the several Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans, indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem, but will be more glad of an ill Answer, than of a good Paiment. This is more than Gesco knows: he sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, That they may do well, if they stand in want of Money, to seek it of their Captain, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? they stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the Treasure that he had brought; yea, upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and for the rest to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their Fellows begin to grow calm, by his fair Language: wherefore they cast into Bonds both him and all the Carthaginians that they can find, that so the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open War. Matho follicits all Africk, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needful to use perswasion; the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole Country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions with which they have plagued others. It is true, that adversity hath never been untold of her errors:

errors: and as ſhe is ever aſſured to hear her own, ſo commonly with her own ſhe undergoes thoſe of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang under the Wheel, tell them boldly, that their Impoſitions were mercileſs; that they took from them the one half of their Corn, that they doubled their Tributes in all things elſe; and that they inflicted upon their Vaſſals the greateſt Puniſhments for the leaſt Offences. Theſe Cruelties the Carthaginians themſelves have forgotten: but the People that have ſuffered ſo much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only ſuch as can bear Arms, are ready to do ſervice in this great Commotion; but the very Women bring forth their Jewels and other Ornaments, offering all to ſail for maintenance of ſo juſt a Quarrel. By this great forwardneſs, and liberal contribution, Matho and Spendius are ſupplied with a ſtrong aid of threeſcore and ten thouſand Africans: and are moreover furniſhed with Money, not only to ſatisfie the preſent appetite of their men, but ſufficient to continue the War begun, though it ſhould be of long endurance.

§. II.

Diverſe Obſervations upon this War with the Mercinaries.

† I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are driven to uſe help of Mercinaries.

HEre let us reſt a while, as in a convenient breathing place: whence we may take proſpect of the ſubject, over which we travel. Behold a tyrannical City, perſecuted by her own Mercinaries with a deadly War. It is a common thing, as being almoſt neceſſary, that a Tyranny ſhould be upheld by mercinary Forces: it is common that Mercinaries ſhould be falſe: and it is common that all War made againſt Tyrants, ſhould be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we ſeldom hear that the ruine of a Tyranny is procured or ſought by thoſe that were hired to maintain the Power of it: and ſeldom or never do we read of any War that hath been proſecuted with ſuch inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyranny, is A violent Form of Government, not reſpecting the good of the Subject, but only the pleaſure of the Commander. I purpoſely forbear to ſay, that it is the unjuſt rule of one over many: for very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their Dominion over their Subjects was none other than a meer Tyranny; though it were ſo, that they themſelves were a great City, and a Popular Eſtate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needful, that I ſhould call this form of commanding, violent; ſince it may well and eaſily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardleſs of his Life and Welfare; unleſs himſelf be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly poſſeſſed with ſome extream Paſſion of Love. The practiſe of Tyranny is not always of a like extremity: for ſome Lords are more gentle than others to their very Slaves; and he that is moſt cruel to ſome, is mild enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheleſs, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers Diſcretion cannot extend it ſelf, unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of ſeveral men; it is commonly ſeen, that the taſte of ſweetneſs, drawn out of oppreſſion, hath ſo good a reliſh, as continually inflames the Tyrants Appetite, and will not ſuffer it to be reſtrained with any limits of reſpect. Why ſhould he ſeek out bounds to preſcribe unto his deſires, who cannot endure the face of one ſo honeſt, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from ſome few: by ſparing none, he ſhould have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: but every one could have ſpared more. He hath wrung all their Purſes, and now he hath enough: but (as Covetouſneſs is never ſatisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a Stock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviſeth new tricks of Robbery, and is not better pleaſed with the Gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: but he thinks by Cruelty to change Hatred into Fear. So he makes it his exerciſe to torment and murther all whom he ſuſpecteth: in which courſe, if he ſuſpect none unjuſtly, he may be ſaid to deal craftily: but if Innocency be not ſafe, how can all this make any Conſpirator to ſtand in fear, ſince the Traitor is no worſe rewarded than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other ſecurity, than to diſarm all his Subjects; to fortifie himſelf within ſome ſtrong place; and for defence of his Perſon and State, to hire as many luſty Souldiers as ſhall be thought ſufficient. Theſe muſt not be of his own Country: for if not every one, yet ſome one or other might chance to have a feeling of the publick miſery. This conſidered he allures unto him a deſperate Rabble of Strangers, the moſt unhoneſt that can be found; ſuch as have neither Wealth nor Credit at Home, and will therefore be careful to ſupport him, by whoſe only favour they are maintained. Now leſt any of theſe, either by deteſtation of his wickedneſs, or (which in wicked men is moſt likely) by promiſe of greater reward than he doth give, ſhould be drawn to turn his Sword againſt the Tyrant himſelf: they ſhall all be permitted to do as he doth; to Rob, to Raviſh, to Murther, and to ſatisfie their own Appetites in moſt outragious manner; being thought ſo much the more aſſured to their Maſter, by how much the more he ſees them grow hateful to all men elſe. Conſidering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I muſt be fain to ſay, that theſe are not Dreams: though ſome Engliſh men perhaps that were unacquainted with Hiſtory, lighting upon this Leaf, might ſuppoſe this Diſcourſe to be little better. This is to ſhew, both how Tyranny grows to ſtand in need of mercinary Souldiers, and how thoſe Mercinaries are, by mutual obligation, firmly aſſured unto the Tyrant.

† II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects, is worſe than the Tyranny of one man: and that a Tyrannical City muſt likewiſe uſe mercinary Souldiers.

NOw concerning the Tyranny, wherewith a City or State oppreſſeth her Subjects; it may appear ſome ways to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearful of her Life: the leſs need hath ſhe therefore, to ſecure her ſelf by cruelty cruelty. A City is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the less to pluck from her subjects. If War, or any other great occasion drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary sums of Money: the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous and hateful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor to his Grandmother Antonia) that I may do what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And Juvenal reckons it as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her Slaves; that whilest she was whipping them, she painted her Face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signs of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignity: likely it is, that they will not extreamly hate her, although desire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In these respects it is not needful, that she should keep a Guard of licentious Cut-throats, and maintain them in all Villainy, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must do: her own Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all Male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a City is scarce able to deserve the Name of a Tyranness, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his People, are not so heavy, as the burthens imposed by a cruel City. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was fain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his Gravity might not hinder the People from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought upon the open Stage? By common practise, and general approved custom, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private Vertue or Vice of any one man, nor by metaphysical abstraction of the Universal from the Singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I have said elsewhere) that it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set down: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his Humour may be found, and soothed; Age, or good Advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his Successour may prove better. Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which becoming hereditary to their Posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawful Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannical City, have no such hope: their Mistress is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, until they be pulled out of her hands; and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mighty Chariotier. This is woful: yet their present sufferings make them less mindful of the future. New Flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same sore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor Kindred and Friends, who mean not to return home empty to their Hives, without a good lading of Wax and Honey. These fly into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans Wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans Enemies, and all his fears: becoming themselves within a little space, the Enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterful Guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: but were this effected, what availeth it? The Love of one Governour is purchased with Gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more loving than could be wished, in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary Faction at home, a bitter Enemy to both his Fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the miseries of this Tyranny are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of Civil War. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recovery, against extorting Magistrates: yet we find, that it served not wholly to restrain their Provincial Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their Kindred and Friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these Enormities rehearsed, though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgment. If the Subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions: what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome Tributes; they loved not to hear that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the Rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as Presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to do the like, when it should fall to his turn; and he was held a notable States-man, whose Robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common Treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practise are not extant: the Government of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that is lively set out by Tully, may serve to inform us what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more general Proposition, That a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the Tyranny of a City is far more intolerable than that of any one most wicked man.

Suitable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their Subjects: and again, suitable to the hatred of the Subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that in Wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African Souldiers; in Africk it self, they had rather be beholding to others that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick War, shift his Mercinaries out of their own Countries; Ut Afri in Hispaniâ, Hispania in Africâ, melior procul ab domo futurus uterque miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; That the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from Home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confess, whether these African and Spanish Hirelings, could properly be termed Mercinaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, and carried into the Liv. Dec. 3. l. 1. the Field, not only by Reward, but by Duty. Yet seeing their Duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercinaries.

†. III.

The Dangers growing from the use of mercinary Souldiers, and foreign Auxiliaries.

THE extream danger, growing from the Employment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithful, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all Places and Countreys, whereinto they are drawn; as being held by no other Bond, than their own Commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such Hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest Extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States, that have trusted them. These Mercinaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy, when Charles the eighth of France did pass the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples, with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queen Joan of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden; and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like unto his Father was Francis Sforza, the first of that Race, Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his Slaves; even with the same Army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodovick Sforza, the Son of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto Posterity, in losing his whole Estate by the Treachery of such faithless Mercinaries, as his own Father had been. For, having waged an Army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his Person, into their hands; he was by them delivered up unto his Enemy the French King, by whom he was incloſed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like Inconvenience is found, in using the help of foreign Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired 10000 Turks, against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by perswasion or force, set them again over Sea upon Asia side: which gave beginning to the Christian Servitude, that soon after followed. Alexander, the Son of Cassander, sought Aid of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdom, slew the same Alexander who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syracon the Turk was called into Ægypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turk did settle himself so surely in Ægypt, that Saladine his Successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for Examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two Kingdoms.

Against all this may be alledged, the good success of the united Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kind of Souldiers, in their late War. Indeed these Low-Countreys have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad, at the defence of a Place well fortified: but in open Field they have seldom been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: and the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: and therefore could ill spare, unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common Purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercinary Souldiers. Many fruitless Attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that brave Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt it to his grief, in his retreat from Groeninghen; when in the very instant, that required their service in Fight, his Mercinaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their Cowardize under a shew of greedines; or at least, by meer Covetousnes, have ruined in one hour the labour of many months. I will not stand to prove this by many Examples; for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the Honour of Monsieur, the Duke of Anjou, Brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the World knows. He that would lay open the danger of foreign Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their Succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling Yoke upon the peoples Necks? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilst he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his Plot, an imaginary sorrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerp, as verily believing the Town to be surprized and won; the Death of the Count St. Aignan, who fell over the Wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own Troops, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his own French, who stood in need of pity. Then was his feigned passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of mind; wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou do with me? So the Affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using mercinary Souldiers, or the help of foreign Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Sovereignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their Enemy, pursued him with continual War; when the Heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just and wise (though not engaged in any Quarrel) either to make profit of his Neighbours Miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his own

In-

Inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very ſafely repoſe confidence, in the Forces of theſe their neighbour-Countreys. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardful of the Pay that they ſhould receive; but well affected unto the Cauſe that they took in hand: or if any were cold in his devotion, to the ſide whereon he fought; yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the Engliſh would have rewarded him with Death, if his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore truſted with the cuſtody of Cities; they were held as Friends, and Patrons; the neceſſity of the poorer ſort was relieved, before the Pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three ſuch Princes, reigning at one time, ſhall agree ſo well, to maintain againſt the power of a fourth, injurious (or at leaſt ſo ſeeming) to them all, a neighbour-Countrey, of the ſame Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may ſuch a Countrey be ſecure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other buſineſs, in hope of like ſucceſs. But theſe Circumſtances meet ſo ſeldom, as it may well hold true in general, That mercinary, and foreign auxiliary Forces, are no leſs dangerous, than the Enemy, againſt whom they are entertained.

†. IV.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them aſſurance to uſe the ſervice of their own Subjects in their Wars. That in man's nature there is an affection breeding Tyranny, which hindreth the uſe and benefit of the like moderation.

HERE may it be demanded, Whether alſo the Romans were not compelled to uſe ſervice of other Souldiers in their many great Wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? for if it were their manner to arm their own Subjects; how happened it, that they feared no Rebellion? if Strangers; how then could they avoid the Inconveniences above rehearſed? The Anſwer is; That their Armies were compounded uſually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number: to which they added, as occaſion required, ſome Companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their Subjects, as were either intereſſed in the Quarrel, or might beſt be truſted. They had, about theſe Times, (though ſeldom they did employ ſo many) ten Roman Legions; a good ſtrength, if all other help had been wanting: which ſerved to keep in good order their Subjects, that were always fewer in the Army than themſelves. As for the Latines, if Conſanguinity were not a ſufficient Obligation; yet many Priviledges and Immunities, which they enjoyed, made them aſſured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almoſt at liberty, as being bound to little elſe, than to ſerve it in War. It is true, that a Yoke, how eaſie ſoever, ſeems troubleſom to the Neck that hath been acuſtomed to Freedom. Therefore many People of Italy have taken occaſion of ſeveral Advantages, to deliver themſelves from the Roman Subjection. But ſtill they have been reclaimed by War; the Authors of Rebellion have been ſharply puniſhed; and the People, by degrees, have obtained ſuch liberty, as made them eſteem none otherwiſe of Rome, than as the common City of all Italy. Yea, in proceſs of time it was granted unto many Cities, and thoſe far off removed, even to Tarſus in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born, That all the Burgeſſes ſhould be free of Rome it ſelf. This Favour was conferred abſolutely upon ſome; upon ſome, with reſtraint of giving voice in election of Magiſtrates, or with other ſuch limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great Conqueſt, to releaſe unto their new Subjects half of their Tribute which they had been wont to pay unto their former Lords, which was a ready way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their preſent condition; when the review of harder Times paſt, ſhould rather teach them to fear a Relapſe, than to hope for better in the future, by ſeeking Innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a ſpecial note of the Romans good Government, That when ſome, for their well-deſerving, have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome; they have refuſed it, and held themſelves better contented with their own preſent eſtate. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Petellia, a City of the Brutians in Italy, choſe rather to endure all extremity of War, than, upon any condition, to forſake the Romans; even when the Romans themſelves had confeſſed, that they were unable to help theſe their Subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithful to the utmoſt. Such love purchaſed theſe mild Governors, without impairing their Majeſty thereby. The ſum of all is: They had, of their own, a ſtrong Army; they doubled it, by adjoyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increaſed it, as need required, with other help of their own Subjects: all, or the moſt of their followers, accounting the proſperity of Rome to be the common good. Liv. Dec. 3. l. 3. Liv. ibid.

The moderate uſe of ſovereign Power being ſo effectual, in aſſuring the People unto their Lords, and conſequently, in the eſtabliſhment or enlargement of Dominion: it may ſeem ſtrange, that the practice of Tyranny, whoſe effects are contrary, hath been ſo common in all Ages. The like, I know, may be ſaid, of all Vice, and Irregularity whatſoever. For it is leſs difficult (whoſoever think otherwiſe) and more ſafe, to keep the way of Juſtice and Honeſty, than to turn aſide from it; yet commonly our Paſſions lead us into by-paths. But where Luſt, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, ſeduceth our Reaſon; the ſame unruly appetite either bringeth with it an excuſe, or at leaſtwiſe taketh away all cauſe of wonder. In Tyranny it is not ſo: foraſmuch as we can hardly deſcry the paſſion, that is of force to inſinuate it ſelf into the whole tenor of a Government. It muſt be confeſſed, that lawleſs deſires have bred many Tyrants: yet ſo, that theſe deſires have ſeldom been hereditary, or long-laſting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, ſometimes before his death; by which means the Government hath been reduced to a better form. In ſuch caſes, the ſaying of Ariſtotle holds, That Tyrannies are of ſhort continuance. But this doth not ſatisfie the Queſtion in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exerciſe Tyranny? why did the Athenians? why have many other Cities done the like? If in reſpect of their general good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill courſe for the ſafety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherein ſo many thouſand Citizens, divided and ſubdivided within themſelves by Factions, did all concur, notwithſtanding the much diverſity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtleſs, we muſt be fain to ſay, That Tyranny is, by Arſt. Pol. lib. 5. cap.

it

it self, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt, even by nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise unto bruit Beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of Rule belongeth unto the nobler part of Reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptness to yield obedience. Now as Hunger and Thirst are given by nature, not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their Life: as Fear, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankind, and to all Creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, engrafted by nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable Creature, for the ordering of his Life, in a civil form of Justice. All these in-bred Qualities are good and useful. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an unproper term: since they grow from Appetites, found in less worthy Creatures than Beasts, and are yet not so common in Beasts, as in Men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto bruit Beasts, are held less vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by sharper Laws, as being in general more pernicious. But as no Corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a Vice more hurtful unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble Root, even the depraved Affection of Ruling. Hence arise those two great Mischiefs, of which hath been an old Question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or that nothing, should be lawful. Of these, a dull Spirit, and over-loaden by fortune, with Power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary Distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Countrey is able to subsist: yet the defective dulness, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meer necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyranny is more active, and pleaseth it self in the excess, with a false colour of Justice. Examples of Stupidity, and unaptness to rule, are not very frequent, though such Natures are every where found: for this quality troubles not it self in seeking Empire; or if by some error of Fortune, it encounter therewithal, (as when Claudius, hiding himself in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some Friend, or else a Wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also Cruelty doth help to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a Name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & fœlix scelus, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist. There is no Reward or Honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned to those, that know how to increase, or to preserve humane Nature: all Honours, Greatness, Riches, Dignities, Empires, Triumphs, Trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar, and Alexander, have un-made and slain each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of man's Judgement, in valuing things according to common Opinion. But the true Name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeness, is none other, than Ferity: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any Vice. It exceedeth indeed all other Vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast; no less than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible Crimes, exceed in Villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble Appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityocamptes, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better Examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischievous Heads were assisted by the Hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old Examples of Ferity, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of Reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Free-men, and Slaves.

The Rule of the Husband over the Wife, and of Parents over their Children, is natural, and appointed by God himself; so that it is always, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole Authority, which one Free-man can have over another. The Rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole Countrey: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more masterly Rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said; Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowl of the Air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the Earth: which also he confirmed unto Noah and his Children, saying, The fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the Earth, and upon every fowl of the Air, upon all that moveth upon the Earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this Dominion to Man, gave also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this Power hath since extended it self, over a great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to govern themselves, proves them, according unto Aristotles Doctrine, to be naturally Slaves.

Gen. 9. 2.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppress men with Bondage: unless the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a Man shall not be punished for the death of a Servant, whom he hath slain by correction, if the Servant live a day or two, because he is his money; or else by the Captivity of the Midianitish Girls, which were made Bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtless the custom hath been very ancient: for Noah laid this Curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-servants, and maid-servants, which were none other than Slaves. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this old kind of Servility: but surely, they are deceived, that think so. St. Paul desired the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: yet wrote he for this unto Philemon, by way of request, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same St. Paul giveth unto Servants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a servant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured Liberty unto many; not only in regard of Piety, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear, of being discovered by their Slaves, unto the Persecuters of Religion. Mahomet likewise by giving Liberty to his Followers, drew many unto his Impiety: but whether he forbad it, as unlawful, unto his Sectators, to hold one another of them in Bondage, I cannot tell; ſave that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it ſeems he did not. In England we had many Bond-ſervants, until the Times of our laſt Civil Wars: and I think that the Laws concerning Villanage are ſtill in force, of which the lateſt are the ſharpeſt. And now, ſince Slaves were made free, which were of great uſe and ſervice, there are grown up a Rabble of Rogues, Cut-purſes, and other the like Trades; Slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kind of Dominion be lawful, or not; Ariſtotle hath well proved, that it is natural. And certainly we find not ſuch a latitude of difference, in any Creature, as in the Nature of Man: wherein (to omit the infinite diſtance in eſtate, of the Elect and Reprobate) the wiſeſt excel the moſt fooliſh, by far greater degree, than the moſt fooliſh of Men doth ſurpaſs the wiſeſt of Beaſts. Therefore when Commiſeration hath given way to Reaſon, we ſhall find, that Nature is the ground even of maſterly Power, and of ſervile Obedience, which is thereto correſpondent. But it may be truly ſaid, that ſome Countreys have ſubſiſted long, without the uſe of any Servility: as alſo it is true, that ſome Countreys have not the uſe of any tame Cattel. Indeed the Affections which uphold civil Rule, are (though more noble) not ſo ſimply needful, unto the ſuſtentation either of our kind, as are Luſt, and the like; or of every one, as are Hunger and Thirſt; which notwithſtanding are the loweſt in degree. But where moſt vile, and ſervile Diſpoſitions, have liberty to ſhew themſelves begging in the Streets, there may we more juſtly wonder, how the dangerous toil of Sea-faring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the ſwarm of idle Vagabonds ſhould increaſe, by acceſs of thoſe, that are weary of their own more painful condition. This may ſuffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a deſire of abſolute Dominion: whereunto the general cuſtom of Nations doth ſubſcribe; together with the pleaſure which moſt men take in Flatterers, that are the baſeſt of Slaves.

This being ſo, we find no cauſe to marvel, how Tyranny hath been ſo riſe in all Ages, and practiſed, not only in the ſingle Rule of ſome vicious Prince, but ever by conſent of whole Cities and Eſtates: ſince, other Vices have likewiſe gotten head, and born a general ſway; notwithſtanding that the way of Vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have uſed well the inferior Paſſions: how then can we expect, that the moſt noble Affections ſhould not be diſordered? In the government of Wife and Children, ſome are utterly careleſs, and corrupt all by their dull connivency: others, by maſterly Rigor, hold their own blood under condition of Slavery. To be a good Governor is a rare commendation; and to prefer the Weal publick above all reſpects whatſoever, is the Vertue juſtly termed Heroical. Of this Vertue, many Ages afford not many Examples. Hector is named by Ariſtotle, as one of them; and deſervedly, if this praiſe be due to extraordinary heighth of Fortitude, uſed in defence of a man's own Countrey. But if we conſider, that a love of the general Good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the Fountain of all Goodneſs, we ſhall find, that no moral Vertue, how great ſoever, can, by it ſelf, deſerve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroical doth. Wherefore we muſt ſearch the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; ſuch, as David, Joſaphat, and Joſias were. Of Chriſtian Kings, if there were many ſuch, the World would ſoon be happy. It is not my purpoſe to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praiſe where it is due; or by preferring a leſs excellent. But he that can find a King, religious, and zealous in God's Cauſe, without enforcement either of Adverſity, or of ſome regard of State; a procurer of the general Peace and Quiet; who not only uſeth his Authority, but adds the travel of his Eloquence, in admoniſhing his Judges to do Juſtice; by the vigorous Influence of whoſe Government, Civility is infuſed, even into thoſe Places, that have been the Dens of ſavage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite aboliſhed a ſlaviſh Brehon Law, by which an whole Nation of his Subjects were held in Bondage; and one, whoſe higher Vertue and Wiſdom doth make the praiſe, not only of Nobility, and other Ornaments, but of abſtinence from the Blood, the Wives, and the Goods, of thoſe that are under his Power, together with a World of chief Commendations belonging unto ſome good Princes, to appear leſs regardable: he, I ſay, that can find ſuch a King, findeth an Example, worthy to add unto Vertue an honourable Title, if it were formerly wanting. Under ſuch a King, it is likely by God's bleſſing, that a Land ſhall flouriſh, with increaſe of Trade, in Countreys before unknown; that Civility and Religion ſhall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countreys; and that the happineſs of his Subjects, ſhall cauſe the Nations far off removed, to wiſh him their Sovereign. I need not add hereunto, that all the Actions of ſuch a King, even his bodily Exerciſes, do partake of Vertue: ſince all things tending to the preſervation of his Life and Health, or to the mollifying of his Cares, (who, fixing his Contemplation upon God, ſeeketh how to imitate the unſpeakable Goodneſs, rather than the inacceſſible Majeſty, with both of which himſelf is endued, as far as humane Nature is capable) do alſo belong to the furtherance of that common Good, which he procureth. Leſt any man ſhould think me tranſported with Admiration, or other Affection, beyond the bounds of Reaſon, I add hereunto, that ſuch a King nevertheleſs as a man muſt die, and may err: yet Wiſdom and Fame ſhall ſet him free, from Error, and from Death, both with and without the help of Time. One thing I may not omit, as a ſingular Benefit (though there be many other beſides) redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his Goodneſs. The People that live under a pleaſant yoke, are not only loving to their Soveraign Lord, but free of Courage, and no greater in Muſter of Men, than of ſtout Fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over Slaves, ſhall be attended, in time of neceſſity, by ſlaviſh Minds, neither loving his Perſon, nor regarding his or their own Honour. Cowards may be furious, and Slaves outragious, for a time: but among Spirits that have once yielded unto Slavery, univerſally it is found true, that Homer ſaith, God bereaveth a man of half his Vertue, that day when he caſteth him into bondage.

Of theſe things, I might perhaps more ſeaſonably have ſpoken, in the general Diſcourſe of Government: but where ſo lively an Example, of the Calamity following a tyrannical Rule, and the uſe of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it ſelf, as is this preſent buſineſs of the Carthaginians, I thought that the Note would be more effectual, than being barely delivered, as out of a common Place. Hom. Odyſſ. l. 17.

§. III.

§. III.

How the War againſt the Mercinaries was diverſly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable ſucceſs. The bloody Counſels of the Mercinaries, and their final deſtruction.

BEing now to return unto thoſe Mercinaries, from whom I have thus far digreſſed, I cannot readily find, by what name henceforth I ſhould call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they ſeek their Wages already due, ſo that they are neither Mercinaries nor Mutiners. Had they all been ſubjects unto Carthage, then might they juſtly have been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principal part of them, ought none Allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to ſubvert. Wherefore I will borrow the Name of their late Occupation, and ſtill call them Mercinaries, as Polybius alſo doth.

Theſe uſing the advantage of their preſent ſtrength, beſieged * Utica and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being ſeated upon the weſtern Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of land; Hippagreta ſtanding inwards upon the great Lake; Utica farther out upon the Sea. Neither was the Camp at Tunis abandoned, which lay filthy to hinder the Carthaginians from paſſing up into the Countrey: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men to follow the War in all parts at once.

* Utica is ſeated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not far within the Promontory of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Biſerta; and by the Africans themſelvs, Garel Melba. Niger ſaith, that the Town it ſelf is ruined, and the place whereon it ſtood, ſo called Mazachares. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, ſaith Silius. As it flouriſhed before Carthage was ſet up, ſo did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans in the third Punick War. Famous it was by the Death of Cato the Younger, who held it againſt Ceſar. Victor, that worthy Divine was Biſhop thereof, in the time of Genſeric the Arian, who lived all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the Story of his Cruelties.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected peril, any man may conceive. But the buſineſs it ſelf awakes them haſtily. They are hardly preſt on all ſides; and therefore travelled their brains to the uttermoſt, how to ſhake off theſe furious Dogs from their Shoulders, who ſometimes by night, ſometimes by day, came unto the very Walls of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their General: who failed not in his accuſtomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatſoever was needful, as well to relieve a Town beſieged, as to batter and aſſail any place defended againſt him. With theſe proviſions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Utica ſo ſuddenly, that the Enemies, as men ſurpriſed, forſook their Trenches, and retired themſelves unto a riſing piece of woody ground, where they might be ſafe againſt the violence of his Beaſts. Hanno, thinking that he had to do with Numidians, whoſe cuſtom was, after any loſs, to fly two or three whole days journey off; preſently entred the Town, to ſhew himſelf after this his Victory. But theſe good Fellows, againſt whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as ſoon as they perceived that he knew not how to uſe a Victory; they aſſailed their own Camp, and with great ſlaughter, drave the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themſelves within Utica, and got poſſeſſion of all the ſtore, that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This bad beginning Hanno followed with ſutable indiſcretion: loſing the benefit of many fair opportunities, and ſuffering the Enemies to take poſſeſſion of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their Sheet-anchor; ſending to the Field their great Captain, Amilcar, whom they furniſhed with ten thouſand Foot of ſupply, and ſeventy Elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do before he ſhould be able to meet with the Enemy upon equal ground. For beſides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had ſuffered them to win the only Bridge, by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was paſſable unto theſe that were to travel into the Continent. This River had not many foords, nor thoſe eaſie for a ſingle man to get over: but upon them all was kept ſuch guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in ſeeking way by force. As for the Bridge it ſelf, Matho and his Followers were there lodged: and had there built a Town, wherein to lie commodiouſly, intentive only to the cuſtody thereof. But Amilcar had obſerved, that the very mouth of Bagradas uſed to be ſometimes cloyed with Sand and Gravel, that was driven in by certain cuſtomary Winds, and could not be driven out again by force of that ſlow River, till the wind falling, or changing, ſuffered the weight of the Waters to disburden their Channel. Hereof he made uſe, and taking his opportunity, paſſed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the Enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius look about him, when once it was heard that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the news, knowing that they were no longer to deal with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able ſpirit, even with their own Maſter in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was ſoon changed into preſumption; when more than fifteen thouſand of their own Society were come from Utica, and other ten thouſand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Army was far greater than that of Amilcar, and they were in their own judgment, the better men, upon which confidence, they reſolved to charge him on all ſides, and beat him down, in deſpight of his Worth and Reputation. With this reſolution they attended upon him; watching for ſome advantage, and ſtill exhorting one another to play the men, and give the Onſet. Eſpecially they that followed him in the Rere, had a great mind to begin the Fight; whereunto their promptneſs was ſuch, as took from them their former circumſpection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himſelf on plain grounds, that were fitteſt for the ſervice of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Army. Neither made he ſhew of any deſire to fight, but ſuffered the raſhneſs of his Enemies to increaſe, till it ſhould break into ſome diſorder. At length, perceiving that with more boldneſs than good heed, they followed him ſo near, as would be little for their good, if he ſhould turn upon them, he haſtned his march, even to ſuch a pace, as made a ſhew little differing from plain flight. The Mercinaries preſently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whileſt they confuſedly, as in ſudden opinion of Victory, were driving at the heels of thoſe that had the Rere, Amilcar wheeled about and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, ſo that amazed with the apprehenſion of inexpected danger, they fled without making any reſiſtance. In this Overthrow, there were ſix thouſand of the Mercinaries ſlain, and about two thouſand taken; the reſt fled; ſome to the Camp at Utica, others to the Town at the Bridge, whither Amilcar followed them ſo faſt, that he wan the place eaſily: the Enemies being thence alſo fled unto Tunis, as not having recollected their ſpirits to make it good.

The Fame of this Victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in purſuing it, cauſed many Towns revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himſelf, in this dangerous time. He ſent about Numidia and Africk for new ſupplies; admoniſhing the People, now or never to do their beſt, for the recovery of their freedom; he perſwaded Spendius and Autaritus that was Captain of the Gauls, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at leaſt the foot of ſome Hill, where they might be ſafe from the Elephants; and he himſelf continued to preſs the Town of Hippagreta with an hard Siege. It was neceſſary for Amilcar, in paſſing from place to place, as his buſineſs required, to take ſuch ways as there were: for all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spendius, who ſtill coaſted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plain ſurrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African ſuccours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his perſonal worth did greatly benefit his Country. For Naravaſus, a young Gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occaſion ſerving to get the acquaintance and love of ſo brave a man, which he much deſired: and therefore came unto Amilcar, ſignifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all ſervice. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend; promiſed unto him his own Daughter in Marriage; and ſo wan from the Enemies two thouſand Horſe, that following Naravaſus, turned unto the Carthaginians ſide. With this help he gave battel unto Spendius, wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own Valour, to his new Friend. So the Victory was great: for there were ſlain ten thouſand of Spendius his Fellows, and four thouſand taken Priſoners, but Spendius himſelf, with Autaritus the Gaul, eſcaped to do more miſchief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his Priſoners: pardoning all Offences paſt, and diſmiſſing as many as were unwilling to become his Followers; yet with condition, that they ſhould never more bear Arms againſt the Carthaginians; threatning to take ſharp revenge upon all that ſhould break this Covenant.

This Humanity was vehemently ſuſpected by Matho, Spendius, and Autaritus, as tending to win from them the Hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they reſolved to take ſuch order, that not a man among them ſhould dare to truſt in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any ſafety, whileſt Carthage was able to do him hurt. They counterfeited Letters of advertiſement, wherein was contained, that ſome of their Company, reſpective only of their private benefit, and careleſs of the general good, had a purpoſe to betray them all unto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needful to look well unto Geſco and his Companions, whom theſe Traitors had a purpoſe to enlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to Fidelity; and ſhewing with many words, that the ſeeming humanity of Amilcar toward ſome, was none other than a Bait, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as alſo telling them what a dangerous Enemy Geſco would prove, if he might eſcape their hands. While he is yet in the midſt of his Tale; were Letters come to the ſame purpoſe. Then ſteps forth Autaritus, and ſpeaks his mind plainly: ſaying, that it were the beſt, yea, the only way, for the common ſafety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if ſome were deviſing to make their own Peace, it would go hard with thoſe that had a care of the War; that it were better to make an end of Geſco his Life, than to trouble themſelves with looking to his Cuſtody; that by ſuch a courſe every one ſhould be ingaged in the preſent Action, as having none other hope left, than in Victory alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeak hereagainſt, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autaritus was in great credit with the Souldiers, and could ſpeak ſundry Languages, in ſuch ſort, that he was underſtood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geſco, and all the other Priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible Death, by Torments. Nevertheleſs there were ſome, that for love of Geſco, ſought to alter this intended Cruelty, but they were forthwith ſtoned to death, as a Document unto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they herewithal contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian Priſoners which they took, ſhould be ſerved in like ſort: and that the Subjects or Friends of Carthage ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home: which Rule they obſerved ever afterwards.

Of this Cruelty I need ſay no more, than that it was moſt execrable ferity. As for the Counſel of uſing it, it was like unto the Counſel of Achitophel; All Iſrael ſhall hear that thou art abhorred of thy Father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee, be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſparation. He that is paſt all hope of Pardon, is afraid of his own Fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the puniſhment of leſs Offences, committeth greater. The Cowardize of Offenders, and the revengeful Spirits of thoſe that have been wronged, are breeders of this deſperation: to which may be added, ſome deficiency of Laws, in diſtinguiſhing the Puniſhments of Malefactors according to the degree of their ſeveral Crimes. A Coward thinks all proviſion too little for his own ſecurity. If Phocas be a Coward (ſaid the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murtherous. To be ſtedfaſt and ſure in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defenſative againſt new Injuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianity; and ſuch a quality diſcovered, makes them deadly Enemies, who otherwiſe would have repented, and ſought to make amends for the wrong done in paſſion. This was it which wrought ſo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho and his Africans to ſuſpect even their gentleneſs, as the introduction to extream rigour. Like unto the Errours of Princes and Governours, are the Errors of Laws. Where one and the ſame puniſhment is awarded unto the leſs offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is eaſily tempted to kill him, for his own ſecurity.

Againſt theſe inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, uſed with due reſpect, are the beſt remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as theſe his own Souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courſes, his humanity was ready to invite them: But when they were tranſ-

ported with beaſtly outrage, beyond all regard of honeſty and ſhame, he rewarded their Villainy with anſwerable vengeance, caſting them unto wild beaſts to be devoured.

Until this time, Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himſelf apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may ſeem, for that nothing is remembred of him, ſince his late loſſes. Neither was Amilcar ſorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the War grew to ſuch extremity, as threatned utter ruine to the one or the other ſide: then was Hanno ſent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joyned his Forces. By this acceſs of ſtrength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times: rather he could now perform nothing; ſuch was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagretu, that had ſtood always firm on the Carthaginian Party, did now revolt unto the Enemy, murthering all the Souldiers that they had in Garriſon, and caſting their bodies forth, without ſuffering them to be buried. The Proviſions brought by Sea, for maintenance of the Army, were loſt in ſoul weather: and Carthage it ſelf ſtood in danger of being beſieged, about which Matho and Spendius conſulted, whileſt one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been uſed as the ſafeſt courſe, to ſend forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Army. This was the common practiſe of thoſe two mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes have often imitated; perſwading themſelves, that great Armies are not ſo well conducted by one as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will uſe the greater diligence. They have alſo joyned two chief Commanders in equal Commiſſion, upon this further conſideration; the better to reſtrain the ambition of any one that ſhould be truſted with ſo great a ſtrength. For hereof all Common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples, that have made themſelves Tyrants over thoſe Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point the Venetians have been ſo circumſpect, as they have, for the moſt part, truſted ſtrangers, and not their own, in all the Wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of two commanding in chief, ſerveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them truſt: but in managing the War it ſelf, it is commonly the cauſe of ill ſucceſs. In Wars made near unto Rome it ſelf, when two good Friends were Conſuls, or ſuch two at leaſt as concurred in one deſire of Triumph; which Honour (the greateſt of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years ſervice; it is no marvel, though each of the Conſuls did his beſt, and referred all his thoughts unto none other end than Victory. Yet in all dangerous caſes, when the Conſuls proceeded otherwiſe than was deſired, one Dictator was appointed, whoſe Power was neither hindered by any Partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to ſend forth both the Conſuls to one War; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his own Province; unleſs one buſineſs ſeemed to require them both, and they alſo ſeemed fit to be joyned in the adminiſtration. Now although it was ſo, that the Romans did many times prevail with their joynt Generals: yet was this never or ſeldom, without as much concord as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modeſty hath often been ſuch, that the leſs able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly ſubmitted himſelf to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithſtanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Army, received great and moſt dangerous overthrows; whereof in the ſecond Punick War we ſhall find examples. On the contrary ſide, in their Wars moſt remote, that were always managed by one, they ſeldom failed to win exceeding Honour, as hereafter ſhall appear. Now of thoſe ten Generals which ſerved the Athenians at the Battel of Marathon, it may truly be ſaid, that had not their temper been better than the judgment of the People that ſent them forth, and had not they ſubmitted themſelves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the ſame ſucceſs which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being ſo over-wary, and the other ſo haſty, as all came to nought that they undertook; whereas Cimon alone, as alſo Ariſtides, and others, having ſole charge of all, did their Country and Common-weal moſt remarkable ſervice. For it is hard to find two great Captains of equal diſcretion and Valour; but that the one hath more of Fury than of Judgment, and ſo the contrary, by which the beſt occaſions are as often over-ſlipt, as at other times many actions are unſeaſonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was ſlain after the Battel of Iarnac (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chaſtillon, had the Conduct of the Proteſtant Army) the Proteſtants did greatly bewail the loſs of the ſaid Prince, in reſpect of his Religion, Perſon, and Birth; yet comforting themſelves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hindrance to their Affairs. For ſo much did the Valour of the one out-reach the adviſedneſs of the other, as whatſoever the Admiral intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to loſe, by being over-confident in his own Courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this preſent buſineſs: who, though they were ſtill ſick of their ill grounded Love to Hanno, and were unwilling to diſgrace him; yet ſeeing that all ran towards ruine, through the diſcord of the Generals, commited the deciſion of their Controverſies unto the Army that ſerved under them. The judgment of the Army was, that Hanno ſhould depart the Camp: which he did; and Hannibal was ſent in his ſtead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the Affairs of Carthage began to proſper ſomewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Army near unto the City; and lay before it, as in a Siege. They might well be bold, to hope and adventure much; having in their Camp above fifty thouſand, beſides thoſe that lay abroad in Garriſons. Nevertheleſs, the City was too ſtrong for them to win by aſſault: and the entrance of Victuals they could not hinder, if any ſhould be ſent in by Friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuſe, though during the Wars in Sicil he aſſiſted the Romans, and ſtill continued in their Alliance, yet now ſent ſuccours to the Carthaginians, fearing their fall, and conſequently his own; becauſe if no other State gave the Romans ſomewhat to trouble their diſgeſtion, the Principality of Syracuſe would ſoon be devoured by them. The Romans alſo gave them ſome ſlender aſſiſtance, and for the preſent, refuſed good offers made unto them by the Mercinaries. This they did, to ſhew a kind of noble diſpoſition; on; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the ſequel manifeſtly proved.

Whileſt Matho and his Followers were buſily preſſing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their ſupply: ſo that finding themſelves more ſtraightly beſieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purpoſed to deſiſt from their vain attempt, and try ſome other courſe. Hereupon they iſſue into the Field: where Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captain aſſiſting the Rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their Friends, and take a general care of the buſineſs. The Elephants of Carthage, and Horſe of Naravaſus, made Spendius fearful to deſcend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himſelf to his former method of War, keeping the Mountains and rough Grounds, or occupying the ſtraighteſt Paſſages, wherein the deſperate courage of his men might ſhew it ſelf with little diſadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the Enemy to many Skirmiſhes; in all which, the Succeſs was ſuch, as added courage to his own men, and abated the ſtrength and ſpirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: ſtill intrapping ſome of them, and ſometimes giving them the Overthrow in plain Battel, until at length he got them into a Straight, whence ere they ſhould get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgment was enough to perceive their own diſadvantage: and therefore they had the leſs ſtomach to fight; but awaited for help from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreſeeing, that neceſſity might teach them to dare impoſſibilities, uſed the benefit of their preſent fear, and ſhut them cloſe up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miſerably for ſuccour that came not: and having ſpent all their Victuals, were ſo pinched with Hunger, that they fed upon the Bodies of their Priſoners. This they ſuffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deſerved any favour from Carthage; and hoping that their Friends at Tunis would not be unmindful of them. But when they were driven to ſuch extremity, that they were fain to devour their own Companions, and yet ſaw none appearance or likelihood of relief: their obſtinacy was broken, and they threatned their Captains with what they had deſerved, unleſs they would go forth to Amilcar, and ſeek ſuch Peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to conſultation, wherein it was reſolved to obey the Multitude, and yield themſelves, if it were ſo required, unto the Death, rather than to periſh by the hands of their own Companions. Hereupon they ſend to crave Parley, which is granted; and theſe three come forth to talk with Amilcar in Perſon. What they could ſay unto him, it is hard to conjecture: yet by the Conditions which Amilcar granted, it ſeems that they took the blame upon themſelves, and craved pardon for the Multitude. The Conditions were, that the Carthaginians ſhould chuſe out of the whole number of theſe Enemies, any ten whom they pleaſed, to remain at their diſcretion; and that the reſt ſhould all be diſmiſſed, each in his Shirt, or in one ſingle Coat. When the Peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told theſe Ringleaders, that he choſe them preſently, as part of the ten, and ſo commanded to lay hands on them: the reſt he forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that Peace was concluded upon ſo gentle Articles, thought themſelves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to Arms. But they wanted Captains to order them, and the ſame aſtoniſhment that made them break the Covenants of Peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of juſtice in accompliſhing revenge, and eaſe in doing the execution. They were all ſlain: being forty thouſand, or more in number.

This was a famous exploit, and the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage, and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward, Amilcar, with his Naravaſus and Hannibal, carried the War from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yield: Utica and Hippagreta only ſtanding out, upon fear of deſerved vengeance; and Tunis being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief ſtrength of the Enemy. Coming before this Town, they brought forth Spendius, with his Fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the Walls; to terrifie thoſe of his old Companions, that were ſtill in Arms. With this rigour the Siege began, as if ſpeedy Victory had been aſſured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the oppoſite ſide: too far aſunder to help one another in ſudden accidents; and therefore it behoved each to be the more circumſpect.

Matho from the Walls beheld his own deſtiny, in the miſery of his Companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwiſe, than by a caſt at Dice with Fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army that lay ſecure, as if all danger were paſt, under the command of Hannibal: and with ſo great and unexpected fury he ſallyed, that after an exceeding ſlaughter, he took Hannibal Priſoner; on whom, and thirty the moſt noble of the Carthaginian Priſoners, he preſently revenged the Death of Spendius by the ſame Torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing till it was too late; neither had he ſtrength enough remaining, after this great loſs, to continue the Siege, but was fain to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The Terrour was no leſs within Carthage, upon the fame of this loſs, than had been the joy of the late great Victory. All that could bear Arms, were ſent into the Field under Hanno, whom, it ſeems, they thought the moſt able of their Captains ſurviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one ſole General, near unto their City (for they are known to have truſted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this haſty exigent, to deviſe about repealing it. But thirty principal men are choſen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcars Camp, and by all good perſwaſions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his Honour, that the careleſneſs of Hannibal ſeemed to be imputed unto him, by ſending his Enemy to moderate his Proceedings. Nevertheleſs after many Conferences, the Authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made Friends; and thenceforth, whileſt this War laſted, Hanno took warning by Hannibals Calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean ſeaſon Matho was come abroad; as meaning to uſe the reputation of his late ſucceſs, whileſt it gave ſome life unto his buſineſs. He had reaſon to do as he did: but he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The Skirmiſhes, and light exerciſes of War, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did ſo far abate the ſtrength, and with-all

diminish the credit of Matho, that he resolved to try the fortune of one Battel: wherein either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long Troubles, and insupportable Expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it self in many tryals; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the Enemy had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their Friends to help, and drawing forth into the Field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battel might have been foretold, without help of Witchcraft. Matho, and his Followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring Spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late Skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having often been victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their Enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of Liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to Servitude; as the honour of their State would in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that Adventure. So the Carthaginians wan a great Victory, wherein most of the Africans their Enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this Victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old Masters: Utica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of Favour. But they were soon forced, to take what Conditions best pleased the Victors. Matho and his Fellows were led to Carthage in Triumph; where they suffered all Torments that could be devised, in recompence of the Mischiefs which they had wrought in this War. The War had lasted three years, and about four months, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose Subjects did not love them, should with less expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IV.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Islanders. The faithless dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the Peace.

WHilst Matho and Spendius were making this terrible Combustion in Africk, other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Island to their own use. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Army, (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the sudden. But these Companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to joyn themselves with those that were already revolted, than to endanger themselves by Battel, for the good of that Common-weal, of which they had no care, began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to run one course of Fortune with them in their Enterprize. This their offer was kindly taken; but their Faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all Jealousie and Distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrel of an unjust War, to enjoyn the performance of some notorious and villanous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to perform some such Actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kind of Cruelty did the ungrateful Mantinæans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possest himself of their City, by right of War, did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equal freedom with the rest of the Cities united. These Revolts are also common in our Court-wars; where, in the Conquests of new Fortunes, and making of new Parties, and Factions, without the depression or destruction of old Friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old Enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the Blows of the old Art of Fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit less violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his Associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the Inhabitants of the Province. The Islanders were no less glad, than the Souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrey: but they could not agree about the profit of the Victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the Souldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the Souldiers were of opinion, that the Title of the Carthaginians to that Isle, was devolved unto themselves, by right of Conquest. The same Quarrel would (in likelihood) have risen, between Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African Friends, if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unless the Riches of Carthage, had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey, the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to Blows; which how they were dealt I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, upon Reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with Corn; of whom the Carthaginians took almost five hundred, and held them in Prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Ambassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all Provisions to Carthage. And upon the same Reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Utica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served, as a notable example of the Roman Faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meer regard of greater profit, fit, which kept them ſo temperate, no longer than the hope laſted of thriving better thereby, than they ſhould have done by open breach of Faith. The whole eſtate of Carthage depended, at that time, upon the Vertue of Amilcar: who had he been overthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one main Battel, that mighty City muſt either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercileſs Villains, or have humbled her ſelf under protection of the Romans, with whom ſhe had lately ſtriven for Superiority. That extream neceſſity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one Sally made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from ſuch a miſerable choice. Wherefore it was not unwiſely done of the Romans, to make ſuch demonſtration of kindneſs, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but ſinking Ship, to run her ſelf aground upon their ſhore. But when all was well ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Ambition put off her goodly vizor. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again, began to ſtrike at her head. They entertained the proffer of thoſe Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced War againſt this enfeebled and impoveriſhed City, under a ſhameleſs pretence, That the Preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed againſt Rome it ſelf. The Carthaginians knew themſelves unable to reſiſt; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred Talents, in recompence belike (for I ſee not what Reaſon they could alledg) of the great fear which they had endured, of an Invaſion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently ſought occaſion of War. But neceſſity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the money was paid, how hardly ſoever it was raiſed. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: ſhe her ſelf hath broken the Peace already, which Amilcar purpoſeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, ſhall be accompliſhed by Hannibal his renowned Son.

§. V.

How the Affairs of Carthage went between the African Rebellion, and the ſecond Punick War.

THE injurious dealing of the Romans, expreſſing their deſire to pick a quarrel, ſerved to inſtruct the Carthaginians in a neceſſary leſſon. That either they muſt make themſelves the ſtronger, or elſe reſolve to be obedient unto thoſe that were more mighty. In a City long accuſtomed to rule, the braver determination eaſily took place: and the beſt means were thought upon, for the increaſe of Puiſſance and Empire. The ſtrength, and the jealouſie of the Romans, forbad all Attempts upon the Mediterranean Seas; but the Riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might ſerve, both to exerciſe the Carthaginians in War, and to repair their decayed Forces, with all needful Supplies. Of this Spaniſh Expedition, the charge and ſoveraign truſt was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Countrey did wholly repoſe it ſelf; in hope to recover ſtrength by his means, that had ſaved it from ruine.

Hanno, with ſome other envious men, that were of his Faction, took little pleaſure in the general love and honour, which daily increaſed towards Amilcar and his Friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the moſt worthy of Command in all the City: only they commended peace and quietneſs; adviſing men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whoſe amity they ſaid, that the felicity of Carthage did conſiſt. By ſuch Diſcourſes, harſh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of ſingularity: which the ignorant ſort ſuſpected to be wiſdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable Services that he did, to the ſingular benefit of his Countrey. He paſſed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the Weſtern Coaſt of Spain; in which Countrey, during nine years that he lived there, he ſubjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all thoſe Provinces. But finally, in a Battel that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vettones, (defending himſelf a long time with an admirable reſolution) he was invironed and ſlain: carrying with him to the Grave the ſame great Honour and Fame, by which in many ſignal Victories, he had acquired the Name of a ſecond Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Aſdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. This was a good man of War; but far better in practice and cunning, than in deeds of Arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of Negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding ſo many Subjects and Confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this haſty increaſe. He built a goodly City, upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granado, oppoſite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the Name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this ſucceſs of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled, but begin to cauſe their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken ſo much pains to beat them out of the Iſle of Sicil, as ſuſpecting their Neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themſelves in a War of far leſs importance, (whereof I ſhall ſpeak anon) given them leiſure, without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to help this, at the preſent they knew not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gaules, their ancient Enemies, and neareſt Neighbours to the Weſt. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himſelf to be feared: it is enough if he requeſt, ſince his requeſt ſhall have the vertue of a Command.

* The Spaniards have ſince built a City of the ſame Name in the Weſt-Indies: which being peopled by them in the year 1532. was ſacked by the Engliſh in the year 1586.

Yet were the Romans utterly deſtitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they ſcarce had heard the Name: ſo that there were no Mamertines, nor other ſuch Rebels, to call in Roman Succours. But in the Enterprize of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might alſo ſerve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spaniſh Affairs had no relation to the Peace between theſe two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Aſdrubal had any purpoſe, to extend his Victories unto the Gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman Frontiers: yet (as if ſome ſuch matter had been ſuſpected) they they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their Messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter Pills, to avoid all occasion of War with Rome: yet the Bravery of one man might prove more fastidious, and, resenting the Injury, return such Answer, as would entangle his whole Countrey in the Quarrel, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent Covenant inserted into the Articles of Peace, he took upon him to do it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their ways contented, and sought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for fear of present War, had ratified this new Composition made by Asdrubal, yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an Oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare Authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of Peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of Perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some Reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Mistress over them, stood in fear her self, of receiving Blows from a stouter Dame, there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a People on the South-side of Iberus, entred into Confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other People (neither Subject, nor open Enemy in War to the Carthaginians) into their society: and unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late Agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit Covenant of making the River Iberus a Bound, over which they themselves would not pass, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that River, held almost all the Countrey. Howsoever it were, this Indignity was not so easily digested, as former Injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater Power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right, War against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such terms were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight years: (being slain by a Slave, whose Master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, Son of the Great Amilcar, was chosen General in his stead.

§. VI.

The Estate of Greece from the Death of Pyrrhus, to the Reign of Philip the Son of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the first Punick War, and the vacation following, between it and the second, the Estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as in an After-spring. The whole Countrey had recovered, by degrees, a form of Liberty: the petty Tyrannies (bred of those inferior Captains, which in the Times of general Combustion, had seized each upon such Towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatness, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like Dissensions and Tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to incroach upon it. For after many Quarrels and great Wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules, Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning six and thirty years; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the Son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose Father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him by the revolt of his Souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gaules, he was converting his Forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garisons. But his young Son Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chaced Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his Father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius, (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadel of Corinth; which was justly termed the Fetter of Greece. This Citadel called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep rocky Hill on the North-side of the Town; and was by Nature and Art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the Town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Ægean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the Main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by Land from one half of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which this rich and goodly City had commodious Havens. Alexander, the Son of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his Wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexander's Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, until it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I find nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his Wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a Trick. The device was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and seek her Marriage. The foolish old Widow perceived not how unfit a Match she to requite the benefit with ſome great miſchief. They ſaw that the Achæans were deſirous to bring all Peloponneſus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very jealous. Wherefore theſe Ætolians laboured earneſtly to ſet the Lacedæmonians and Achæans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to paſs, they themſelves ſhould be called into help (it skilled not on what ſide) and ſo get no ſmall ſhare, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their Gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many loſſes that his Kingdom had ſuſtained by the Achæans. Of this Plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to ſuffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedæmonians cauſe to take Arms. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late, and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon, and thereby had provoked the Lacedæmonians to look about them; ſeeing that all Peloponneſus, excepting themſelves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their Friends (who alſo were attempted) was already become Achæan.

The City of Sparta was in ill caſe about theſe times; and ſubject to the injuries of any ſtronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Army, had carried away fifty thouſand Slaves; and, which was worſe, their Diſcipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury raigned among them, the poor was oppreſſed by the rich, and the generoſity of ſpirit, that had ſometime been their general Vertue, was hardly now to be found among the beſt of them. There were left in Sparta no more than ſeven hundred natural Citizens, of whom not above one hundred had Lands, all the reſt were needy People, and deſirous of innovation. Hereupon followed inteſtine ſedition, which endangered the City moſt of all. Agis a good King, who ſought to reform the diſorders of the State, exhorted the People to a ſtrict obſervation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpoſe he cauſed them to paſs an Act for the aboliſhing of all Debts, and equal diviſion of Lands. All the younger and the poorer ſort were glad of this: but the rich men oppoſed it. Theſe had recourſe unto Leonidas the other King (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part, being himſelf a diſſolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence alſo he had his Wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King choſen in his ſtead. But Agis his Friends and Counſellors in this enterpriſe, abuſed his good meaning to their own private Commodity. They were haſty to take away all Debts, and cancel Bonds, for they themſelves were deeply indebted: but the diviſion of Lands they afterwards hindred, becauſe their own Poſſeſſions were great. Hence aroſe a Tumult in Sparta, which theſe men increaſed, by their foul oppreſſion of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leonidas was brought home, and reſtored to his Kingdom, and the two adverſe Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late made King was diſmiſed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into Priſon, and there by his Enemies condemned and ſtrangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-Mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this Cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magiſtrates that ſhould have given Patronage to the Laws, uſing their Power, and more Power than to them belonged, againſt a King that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City, as the Laws required.

The Death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens, and ſerved to eſtabliſh the impotent rule of a few tyrannical Oppreſſors. In which caſe Aratus might well hope to adjoyn Lacedæmon to the Achæan Common-wealth, though it were great injuſtice to take ſuch advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponneſus, and to the benefit of Sparta it ſelf, if it could have been wrought by perſwaſion.

But the ſame man who redreſſed the diſorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did alſo requite the injuſt attempts of the Achæans, even in their own kind: obtruding upon them by force, an union of all Peloponneſus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, ſhould have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus cauſed Agis to be ſlain, took his Wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in Marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamourod on his Wife, and ſought to win her affection, as well as he had her perſon. He diſcourſed much with her about the purpoſe of her former Husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a deſire of accompliſhing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himſelf to be King, whilſt he was very young, he gladly embraced all occaſions of War: for that he hoped by ſtrong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in ſo corrupt an Eſtate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended Title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but ſought to take by ſurpriſe Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein his intelligence failing, he loſt the labour of a painful nights travel, and diſcovered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing ſorry. By theſe degrees the War began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had diſcovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have ſtaid the Quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus would needs fight, and he could do no other than be ruled by them; eſpecially ſeeing Cleomenes was ſo urgent. Ariſtomachus was at that time General of the Achæans (He and Lyſiadas being of great account, ſince they had abandoned their Tyranny) who ſent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his aſſiſtance in a Journey to be made into Laconia. No diſſwaſions of Aratus would ſerve, therefore he came in perſon, and took part of a buſineſs little pleaſing him in the preſent, and leſs in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durſt not fight, but oppoſed himſelf againſt Ariſtomachus, who deſired to give Battel. Yet had the Achæans twenty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thouſand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raiſed an ill report upon Aratus; which Lyſiadas helped to make worſe, by accuſing his Cowardize. Nevertheleſs the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but choſe him their General the year following, againſt Lyſiadas his Accuſer that ſued for the place. Being General himſelf, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the ſlanderous words of Lyſiadas. Therefore he purpoſed to ſet upon the

the Eleans: but was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquiſhed him in a great Battel, and drave him to hide himſelf all night for fear, ſo that he was thought to have been ſlain. This miſadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his own more natural occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whileſt there was no ſuſpition of any great matter that he could undertake; he ſecretly wrought with ſome of the Mantinæans, who did let him into their City. The Mantinæans had once before joyned themſelves with the Achaians; but ſhortly upon fear, or ſome other paſſion, they gave themſelves to the Ætolians, and from the Ætolians, preſently after this Victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not puniſhed, but freely admitted now again into the Achæan Society. As this good ſucceſs repaired the credit of Aratus, ſo another Battel almoſt ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred near unto Megalopolis, where the Achæans had ſomewhat the better at the firſt, but their General durſt not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyſiadas, of whom we ſpake before, grew ſomewhat impatient with anger, and taking with him all the Horſe, brake upon the Lacedæmonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but purſuing them too far into places of hard paſſage, he was ſlain by them, and his Followers driven back upon their own Companions, in ſuch ſort, that finally all the Army was diſordered, and put to flight. This was a great loſs, and incenſed the Achæans againſt Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refuſed to make any longer contribution towards the Pay of thoſe Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the War nevertheleſs; wherein, though Cleomenes wan ſome Towns, and Aratus got the better in one ſmall Fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being weary, and the Spartan King intentive to another buſineſs.

Cleomenes having led into the Field all that were like to hinder his purpoſe, and tired them with painful Journeys, forſook the Achæan War on a ſudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he ſlew the Ephori, and reſtored by force the ancient Diſcipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings, and ſhewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the Power of Kings, and many Diſorders had grown in the City; he juſtified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal diviſion of the Lands, reducing all to the firſt inſtitution. He alſo ſupplied the defect of Citizens, by chuſing new out of ſuch as were Friends to the State, and valiant men: ſo that henceforth his Country might not altogether ſtand in need of mercinary help, as it lately had done, to ſave it ſelf from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and other Enemies. All this was diſpatched in great haſte; the Spartans well ſatisfied, and Cleomenes himſelf ready in the Field, ere his Enemies could take advantage of theſe his Domeſtical Troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durſt iſſue forth of the City, for fear of ſome Rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard that he had waſted all the Country of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleaſure; and was admitted into Mantinæa, and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. Theſe news diſpleaſed them not a little: but they muſt patiently endure to hear worſe. For when Cleomenes had ſhaken off the Power of the Ephori, that curbed his Authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians returned their ancient courage; and he himſelf had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the Poſſeſſion of a few Towns: but adventured to win or loſe all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themſelves on his ſide: and whereas he had gotten Mantinæa, Tegea, and other places, to which they had ſome Title, they willingly renounced all their intereſt unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and ſaw that Antigonus with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would ſhortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he deviſed how to provide againſt the worſt, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to ſave all from utter ruine. The Office of General when it was next put upon him, he refuſed; fearing to be ſo far preſt as to hazzard in one Battel all the Force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance Courage, ſo was his manner of warfare otherwiſe. For he commonly attempted by ſurpriſe, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Iriſh, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forſake the care of the weal publick, though in aiming at the general good, it ſeems that private paſſion drew him into an ill courſe. He ſaw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of Battel; that Mantinæa had not only opened her Gates unto Cleomenes, but ſlain the Achæan Garriſon that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulſion; and that Ariſtomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and ſince General of the Achæans, was now revolted unto the Enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too far off to help, and the nearneſs of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be uſeful, if this King would (as Polybius ſaith) like others, be Friend or Enemy, as ſhould beſt agree with his own profit. To make tryal hereof, Aratus practiſed with ſome of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpoſe, and inſtructed them how to deal with both Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever ſince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by ſome ſpecial benefits. At this time it lay neareſt unto the danger; was very faithful, and therefore deſerved ſuccour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achæans, with their own proper ſtrength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent unto the general Council of Achaia, requeſting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their neceſſity. This was granted, for lack of what elſe to anſwer: and the ſame Embaſſadors diſpatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and reſpect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predeceſſors; of their preſent need, and how it would agree with his Honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them inſtruction, ſhewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loſs or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himſelf did ſtand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans under the Patro-tronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their diſcourſe. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help ſhould not be wanting, ſo far forth, as it might ſtand with the Achæans good liking. Particularly he commended himſelf, by theſe Meſſengers to Aratus; aſſuring them, that he thought himſelf highly bound to this honourable man, whoſe former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a juſt and worthy love to his own Nation. With this anſwer they return to Megalopolis: and are preſently ſent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make ſome ſpeedy concluſion, as the neceſſity of the time required.

The Achæans were glad to hear that Antigonus was ſo inclineable to their deſire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correſpondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his conſent, and praiſed the Wiſdom of his Country-men, that ſo well diſcerned the beſt and likelieſt means of their common ſafety: adding nevertheleſs, that it were not amiſs, firſt of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then ſhould they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he ſhewed himſelf moderate, in that which himſelf of all others did moſt wiſh: to the end, that he might not afterward ſuſtain the common reprehenſion, if any thing fell out amiſs, ſince it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leiſurably, the general conſent.

Nevertheleſs, in true eſtimation, this fineneſs of Aratus might have been uſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrary courſe. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the War, by yielding unto Cleomenes that Power which they gave unto Antigonus: ſince thereby he ſhould both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withal, ſhould have reſtored unto the univerſal State of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pitty) that Vertue having riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelf (as it were) in the ſeat of Principality, by length of time, and ſucceſs of many actions; can ill endure the haſty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelf likely to be over-topped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelf more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was juſtly plagued, when he ſaw his own Honours reverſed by the inſolent Macedonians; and inſtead of living as a Companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long Race of Kings, the Poſterity of Hercules, was fain to do ſacrifice unto Antigonus as unto a God, and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobility was but of five deſcents, and whom perhaps he might have ſeen his Fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the Love of Ptolomy was loſt: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberality as he had uſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeem by their example, to be more wary, both in truſting and diſburſing. Cleomenes himſelf, whileſt this buſineſs with Antigonus was a foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achæans to Battel. At the City of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining Forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make tryal, whether perhaps they might amend their Eſtate, without ſeeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had ſo great a Victory, that the Enemy was no longer able to keep the open Field. The Calamity was ſuch, that Aratus himſelf durſt not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next Election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for Peace; which was granted upon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate unto themſelves the Command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former Ages) to be their Leaders in War. Hereunto, if they would condeſcend, he promiſed unto them, that he would preſently reſtore all places taken from them, and all his Priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans, who deſired him to come unto the City of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held for the concluſion of the War.

Now ſeemed the Affairs of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order than they had ever been ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Wars, yea, or ſince the Perſian Invaſion, when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in a great heat, and thereupon fell extream ſick, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheleſs he ſent home the chief of his Priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good Faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his Friendſhip: who aſſembled again at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it, and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of reſolving. When all would not ſerve turn, he betook himſelf to his cunning, and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving Hoſtages for ſafety of his Perſon. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertiſement: and took it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had been an eaſie matter to have told him ſo much at the firſt, and not have made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſs. Yet that which chiefly ſeems to have troubled him, was the drift of his Oppugners, who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the Gates, and deal only with themſelves and their Meſſengers; or if he would adventure himſelf into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal ſhew, that might breed reſpect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he ſought to hinder his coming thither in perſon, leſt the People hearing the Promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, ſhould preſently be won with his gentle words, and finiſh the Bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Council, bitterly complaining againſt theſe jugling tricks: and Aratus was not far behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Aſſembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all as it were to Fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their preſent weakneſs, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly, many he forced, and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wan

Argos

Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own Son to Antigonus, entreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achæans. Antigonus gave as good words as could be wished: saving that he utterly refused to do any thing, unless he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the Horse against his Enemy the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himself to be [illegible] and bridled. Aratus was herewithal [illegible]ed, but wanted all honest colour to do it: the Corinthians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found, for that the Corinthians perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilest this was in doing, he took special order that Aratus his House and Goods within the Town, should be safely kept for the Owner, to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians and Illyrians to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he give him double the same Pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolomy. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the Gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured Soveraignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own Son as an Hostage to Antigonus, and laboured with the Achæans to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seised upon the Goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Country of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Isthmus; having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the Sreights of Thermopylæ against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this Journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance, and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battel, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force, but he was not able so to do: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally, he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the Gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his Enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been Enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of Friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his Victory, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all Debters to be discharged from their Creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannical, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths-men, and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achæans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces the Rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the Enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood, by continual Messages, that his men which held the Citadel at Argos were almost lost: he began to fear, lest his labour in guarding the entry, should grow frivolous; the Achæans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust Fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos; that both Argives and Achæans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the Streets: when the Horse-men of Antigonus were discovered a-far off, hasting to relieve the Citizens, and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia, losing in short space all, or most, of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans: to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behind with him, but made him Captain General over them and their Confederates, and further entred into Covenant with him, That they should not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane Honors, as sacrifices, and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if instead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achæans. This was hardly taken, yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected, when the Statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the Statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of Marriage; whereto the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his Son to desire it, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with Sacrifices, Feasts, Plays, and all sorts of Games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousie had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity beseeming his old Age. But as he had stollen it, so was it again stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the loss of it, being already spent with Age.

Demetrius, the Son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his Father, reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his Vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually busied in War; wherein his Fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these Times the Power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Grecians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only Son of Demetrius, was a young Child when his Father died; and therefore Antigonus, his Uncle, had the charge of the Kingdom, during the minority of the Prince; but he assumed the Name and Power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own Son, to whom he left the Crown at his death. This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as Willgive, because he was slow in his liberality. He represſed the Dardanians, and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdom, in the beginning of his Reign. Upon confidence of this good Service, he took State upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the People fell to mutiny; but were soon appeased by fair words, and a seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaians took from him the City of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all or most that he held in Greece, if their own Estate had not been endangered by a nearer Enemy. But civil Dissention, which had overthrown the Power of Greece, when it flourished most, overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickness; and gave to this Antigonus no less Authority therein, than Philip, the Father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaians, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their Clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others to their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of Weights, Measure, and Money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder Times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of Rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidæ, when Tisamenus the Son of Orestes possest the Territory of Achaia. In this Estate they continued to the Time of Gyges; after whom, when his Sons sought to change the legal Government of their Predecessors into Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equal. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of Times, till the Reign of Philip and Alexander, Kings of Macedon: who Tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the World. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance, whereof Helice, and Buris or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battel of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a War, no less foolish than cruel, among themselves. But in the one hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or near it, Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomy Ceraunus, left the World; two of the ten remaining Cities and People, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimæi, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that general Accord, and Re-union, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings, they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of Amity, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first Voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimæi, to whom also the Cities of Tritæa, and Phara, joyned themselves, Ægira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Achaians; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and soon after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in Exile, whilst his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own City by night, with Ladders; whence they chaced the Tyrant, and restored the People to liberty. This was in the Time of Antigonus Gonatas, King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaian League: which though at that time it received more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonus, whose subtilty was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsel of Aratus delivered his Countrey from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian League: so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fifty Talents, he pacified the inexplicable Controversies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those Enterprizes following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolomy Evergetes, King of Ægypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure Friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the Conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous Voyage to him into Ægypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly Pictures, with the gift of many curious Pieces, wherein the Workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great Attempts, was the Surprize of the Acrocorinthus, or Citadel of Corinth; which which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by ſome Thieves that he had hired for the purpoſe, who living in the Place, had practiſed to rob Antigonus his Treaſury, paſſing in and out by a ſecret path among the Rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the Aſſailants; as miſtruſting leſt the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having loſt the advantages of the Place already, upon which they had preſumed, before they were aware of any Enemy.

In theſe kind of Night-ſervices, Ambuſhments, Surprizes, and Practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open Field, and plain Battel, he was as timorous. By this ſtrange mixture of Cowardize and Courage, he miniſtred Argument of Diſputation, to Philoſophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was eſteemed, and in ſome caſes approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began Battel; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diverſified, by the ſundry natures of men, and in a manner confined, unto ſeveral ſorts of action. In reſolving which Doubts it may be ſaid; that all Vertue is perfected in men by Exerciſe, wherein they are trained by occaſion: though a natural inclination ſtandeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof muſt be ſupplied with much inſtruction, uſe, good ſucceſs, and other help, yet hardly ſhall grow abſolute in general. Such was Aratus in matter of War. In ſincere affection to his Countrey he was unreproveable, and ſo acknowledged: as his following actions will teſtifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted ſoon after from Antigonus, and entred into the ſame Corporation. So did the Trœzenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew ſo powerful, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos, and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The Enterprize upon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus waſted the Iſle of Salamis, to ſhew his ſtrength, and ſent home the Athenian Priſoners, without ranſom, to allure the City by ſhew of love, yet the Athenians ſtirred neither againſt him, nor for him, as being now grown honeſt Slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the Adventure was carried more ſtrongly. The Achaians came ſometimes to the Gates of the City, but the People ſtirred not: once they entred it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedom; ſundry times, and with diverſe event, they fought with the Tyrants (who roſe up one after another in Argos) in open Field, and ſlew one of them in Battel; but all ſufficed not: until at length Ariſtomachus the Tyrant was ſo terrified, perſwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he conſented to reſign his Eſtate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppreſſed the Phliaſians. Whilſt this buſineſs with the Argives was on foot, Lyſiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was ſo well handled by Aratus, that, without compulſion, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Councel of Achaia: whereby he got ſuch credit, that he was choſen General of their Forces, (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two years together by one man) every ſecond year, for a certain while, he and Aratus ſucceeding one another by turns. But thoſe late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus, were carried with private paſſion, from care of the general good; in which courſes they oppoſed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as ſhall appear in due time.

The Achæans having obtained ſo much Puiſſance and Reputation, that Ptolomy King of Ægypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of Honour) General of their Forces by Sea and Land, made open War upon Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is ſtrange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this Quarrel had loſt a Battel, the Athenians wore Garlands, in ſign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the Victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the Rule was verified, that holds true in general of the multitude, Aut humiliter ſervit, aut ſuperbè dominatur; It is either baſe in ſervice, or inſolent in command. Nevertheleſs when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by money which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garriſon, purchaſed liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correſpondence with the Achæans, loving them, and ſpeaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entred not, ſcorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increaſed within Peloponneſus, by juſtice and honeſty; ſo did the Ætolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponneſus it ſelf, wax very powerful, by ſturdineſs of body, and rude courage in Fight, without help of any other Vertue. They had ſtoutly defended themſelves againſt Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do and ſuffer much; partly by the natural ſtrength and faſtneſs of their Countrey; but eſpecially by the benefit of the time, which called away theſe famous Captains to other buſineſs, as hath been related. They had moleſted Caſſander, in favour of Antigonus; and were themſelves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but ſtout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the Son of the firſt Antigonus, and more or leſs, with all the Kings of Macedon ſucceeding him. They likewiſe held often War with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponneſus: ſo that they were hardened with perpetual travel, ſeldom putting off their Armour. But their hardineſs ill deſerved the Name of valour, ſeeing they had no regard of honeſty or friendſhip; meaſuring all things by their own inſolent will, and thinking all people baſe minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themſelves.

Theſe Ætolians had lately made great Spoyls in Peloponneſus, and occupied a good part of the Countrey. They had invaded the Friends of the Achæans; taken and ſacked Pallene; where although they were ſoundly beaten by Aratus, yet their deſire of gain made them greedy of a new Voyage thither, as to a Countrey wherein ſomewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatas: who preſſed them ſo hardly, that they were driven to ſeek help of the Achæans; which they obtained. The War which the Achæans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponneſus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætolians, at whoſe inſtance it was ſet on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian Forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged; though very baſely the Ætolians, giving thanks in words, deviſed how to requite the benefit with ſome great miſchief. They ſaw that the Achæans were deſirous to bring all Peloponneſus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very jealous. Wherefore theſe Ætolians laboured earneſtly to ſet the Lacedæmonians and Achæans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to paſs, they themſelves ſhould be called into help (it skilled not on what ſide) and ſo get no ſmall ſhare, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their Gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many loſſes that his Kingdom had ſuſtained by the Achæans. Of this Plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to ſuffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedæmonians cauſe to take Arms. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late, and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon, and thereby had provoked the Lacedæmonians to look about them; ſeeing that all Peloponneſus, excepting themſelves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their Friends (who alſo were attempted) was already become Achæan.

The City of Sparta was in ill caſe about theſe times; and ſubject to the injuries of any ſtronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Army, had carried away fifty thouſand Slaves; and, which was worſe, their Diſcipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury raigned among them, the poor was oppreſſed by the rich, and the generoſity of ſpirit, that had ſometime been their general Vertue, was hardly now to be found among the beſt of them. There were left in Sparta no more than ſeven hundred natural Citizens, of whom not above one hundred had Lands, all the reſt were needy People, and deſirous of innovation. Hereupon followed inteſtine ſedition, which endangered the City moſt of all. Agis a good King, who ſought to reform the diſorders of the State, exhorted the People to a ſtrict obſervation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpoſe he cauſed them to paſs an Act for the aboliſhing of all Debts, and equal diviſion of Lands. All the younger and the poorer ſort were glad of this: but the rich men oppoſed it. Theſe had recourſe unto Leonidas the other King (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part, being himſelf a diſſolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence alſo he had his Wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King choſen in his ſtead. But Agis his Friends and Counſellors in this enterpriſe, abuſed his good meaning to their own private Commodity. They were haſty to take away all Debts, and cancel Bonds, for they themſelves were deeply indebted: but the diviſion of Lands they afterwards hindred, becauſe their own Poſſeſſions were great. Hence aroſe a Tumult in Sparta, which theſe men increaſed, by their foul oppreſſion of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leonidas was brought home, and reſtored to his Kingdom, and the two adverſe Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late made King was diſmiſed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into Priſon, and there by his Enemies condemned and ſtrangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-Mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this Cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magiſtrates that ſhould have given Patronage to the Laws, uſing their Power, and more Power than to them belonged, againſt a King that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City, as the Laws required.

The Death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens, and ſerved to eſtabliſh the impotent rule of a few tyrannical Oppreſſors. In which caſe Aratus might well hope to adjoyn Lacedæmon to the Achæan Common-wealth, though it were great injuſtice to take ſuch advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponneſus, and to the benefit of Sparta it ſelf, if it could have been wrought by perſwaſion.

But the ſame man who redreſſed the diſorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did alſo requite the injuſt attempts of the Achæans, even in their own kind: obtruding upon them by force, an union of all Peloponneſus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, ſhould have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus cauſed Agis to be ſlain, took his Wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in Marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamourod on his Wife, and ſought to win her affection, as well as he had her perſon. He diſcourſed much with her about the purpoſe of her former Husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a deſire of accompliſhing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himſelf to be King, whilſt he was very young, he gladly embraced all occaſions of War: for that he hoped by ſtrong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in ſo corrupt an Eſtate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended Title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but ſought to take by ſurpriſe Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein his intelligence failing, he loſt the labour of a painful nights travel, and diſcovered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing ſorry. By theſe degrees the War began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had diſcovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have ſtaid the Quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus would needs fight, and he could do no other than be ruled by them; eſpecially ſeeing Cleomenes was ſo urgent. Ariſtomachus was at that time General of the Achæans (He and Lyſiadas being of great account, ſince they had abandoned their Tyranny) who ſent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his aſſiſtance in a Journey to be made into Laconia. No diſſwaſions of Aratus would ſerve, therefore he came in perſon, and took part of a buſineſs little pleaſing him in the preſent, and leſs in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durſt not fight, but oppoſed himſelf againſt Ariſtomachus, who deſired to give Battel. Yet had the Achæans twenty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thouſand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raiſed an ill report upon Aratus; which Lyſiadas helped to make worſe, by accuſing his Cowardize. Nevertheleſs the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but choſe him their General the year following, againſt Lyſiadas his Accuſer that ſued for the place. Being General himſelf, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the ſlanderous words of Lyſiadas. Therefore he purpoſed to ſet upon the

the Eleans: but was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquiſhed him in a great Battel, and drave him to hide himſelf all night for fear, ſo that he was thought to have been ſlain. This miſadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his own more natural occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whileſt there was no ſuſpition of any great matter that he could undertake; he ſecretly wrought with ſome of the Mantinæans, who did let him into their City. The Mantinæans had once before joyned themſelves with the Achaians; but ſhortly upon fear, or ſome other paſſion, they gave themſelves to the Ætolians, and from the Ætolians, preſently after this Victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not puniſhed, but freely admitted now again into the Achæan Society. As this good ſucceſs repaired the credit of Aratus, ſo another Battel almoſt ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred near unto Megalopolis, where the Achæans had ſomewhat the better at the firſt, but their General durſt not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyſiadas, of whom we ſpake before, grew ſomewhat impatient with anger, and taking with him all the Horſe, brake upon the Lacedæmonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but purſuing them too far into places of hard paſſage, he was ſlain by them, and his Followers driven back upon their own Companions, in ſuch ſort, that finally all the Army was diſordered, and put to flight. This was a great loſs, and incenſed the Achæans againſt Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refuſed to make any longer contribution towards the Pay of thoſe Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the War nevertheleſs; wherein, though Cleomenes wan ſome Towns, and Aratus got the better in one ſmall Fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being weary, and the Spartan King intentive to another buſineſs.

Cleomenes having led into the Field all that were like to hinder his purpoſe, and tired them with painful Journeys, forſook the Achæan War on a ſudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he ſlew the Ephori, and reſtored by force the ancient Diſcipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings, and ſhewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the Power of Kings, and many Diſorders had grown in the City; he juſtified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal diviſion of the Lands, reducing all to the firſt inſtitution. He alſo ſupplied the defect of Citizens, by chuſing new out of ſuch as were Friends to the State, and valiant men: ſo that henceforth his Country might not altogether ſtand in need of mercinary help, as it lately had done, to ſave it ſelf from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and other Enemies. All this was diſpatched in great haſte; the Spartans well ſatisfied, and Cleomenes himſelf ready in the Field, ere his Enemies could take advantage of theſe his Domeſtical Troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durſt iſſue forth of the City, for fear of ſome Rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard that he had waſted all the Country of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleaſure; and was admitted into Mantinæa, and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. Theſe news diſpleaſed them not a little: but they muſt patiently endure to hear worſe. For when Cleomenes had ſhaken off the Power of the Ephori, that curbed his Authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians reſumed their ancient courage; and he himſelf had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the Poſſeſſion of a few Towns: but adventured to win or loſe all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themſelves on his ſide: and whereas he had gotten Mantinæa, Tegea, and other places, to which they had ſome Title, they willingly renounced all their intereſt unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and ſaw that Antigonus with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would ſhortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he deviſed how to provide againſt the worſt, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to ſave all from utter ruine. The Office of General when it was next put upon him, he refuſed; fearing to be ſo far preſt as to hazzard in one Battel all the Force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance Courage; ſo was his manner of warfare otherwiſe. For he commonly attempted by ſurpriſe, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Iriſh, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forſake the care of the weal publick, though in aiming at the general good, it ſeems that private paſſion drew him into an ill courſe. He ſaw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of Battel; that Mantinæa had not only opened her Gates unto Cleomenes, but ſlain the Achæan Garriſon that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulſion; and that Ariſtomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and ſince Ceneral of the Achæans, was now revolted unto the Enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too far off to help, and the nearneſs of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be uſeful, if this King would (as Polybius ſaith) like others, be Friend or Enemy, as ſhould beſt agree with his own profit. To make tryal hereof, Aratus practiſed with ſome of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpoſe, and inſtructed them how to deal with both Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever ſince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by ſome ſpecial benefits. At this time it lay neareſt unto the danger; was very faithful, and therefore deſerved ſuccour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achæans, with their own proper ſtrength. Wherefore it was thought meer, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent unto the general Council of Achaia, requeſting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their neceſſity. This was granted, for lack of what elſe to anſwer: and the ſame Embaſſadors diſpatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and reſpect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predeceſſors; of their preſent need, and how it would agree with his Honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them inſtruction, ſhewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loſs or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himſelf did ſtand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans under the Patro-tronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their diſcourſe. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help ſhould not be wanting, ſo far forth, as it might ſtand with the Achæans good liking. Particularly he commended himſelf, by theſe Meſſengers to Aratus; aſſuring them, that he thought himſelf highly bound to this honourable man, whoſe former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a juſt and worthy love to his own Nation. With this anſwer they return to Megalopolis: and are preſently ſent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make ſome ſpeedy concluſion, as the neceſſity of the time required.

The Achæans were glad to hear that Antigonus was ſo inclineable to their deſire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correſpondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his conſent, and praiſed the Wiſdom of his Country-men, that ſo well diſcerned the beſt and likelieſt means of their common ſafety: adding nevertheleſs, that it were not amiſs, firſt of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then ſhould they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he ſhewed himſelf moderate, in that which himſelf of all others did moſt wiſh: to the end, that he might not afterward ſuſtain the common reprehenſion, if any thing fell out amiſs, ſince it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leiſurably, the general conſent.

Nevertheleſs, in true eſtimation, this fineneſs of Aratus might have been uſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrary courſe. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the War, by yielding unto Cleomenes that Power which they gave unto Antigonus: ſince thereby he ſhould both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withal, ſhould have reſtored unto the univerſal State of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pitty) that Vertue having riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelf (as it were) in the ſeat of Principality, by length of time, and ſucceſs of many actions; can ill endure the haſty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelf likely to be over-topped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelf more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was juſtly plagued, when he ſaw his own Honours reverſed by the inſolent Macedonians; and inſtead of living as a Companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long Race of Kings, the Poſterity of Hercules, was fain to do ſacrifice unto Antigonus as unto a God, and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobility was but of five deſcents, and whom perhaps he might have ſeen his Fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the Love of Ptolomy was loſt: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberality as he had uſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeem by their example, to be more wary, both in truſting and diſburſing. Cleomenes himſelf, whileſt this buſineſs with Antigonus was a foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achæans to Battel. At the City of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining Forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make tryal, whether perhaps they might amend their Eſtate, without ſeeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had ſo great a Victory, that the Enemy was no longer able to keep the open Field. The Calamity was ſuch, that Aratus himſelf durſt not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next Election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for Peace; which was granted upon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate unto themſelves the Command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former Ages) to be their Leaders in War. Hereunto, if they would condeſcend, he promiſed unto them, that he would preſently reſtore all places taken from them, and all his Priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans, who deſired him to come unto the City of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held for the concluſion of the War.

Now ſeemed the Affairs of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order than they had ever been ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Wars, yea, or ſince the Perſian Invaſion, when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in a great heat, and thereupon fell extream ſick, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheleſs he ſent home the chief of his Priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good Faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his Friendſhip: who aſſembled again at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it, and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of reſolving. When all would not ſerve turn, he betook himſelf to his cunning, and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving Hoſtages for ſafety of his Perſon. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertiſement: and took it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had been an eaſie matter to have told him ſo much at the firſt, and not have made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſs. Yet that which chiefly ſeems to have troubled him, was the drift of his Oppugners, who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the Gates, and deal only with themſelves and their Meſſengers; or if he would adventure himſelf into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal ſhew, that might breed reſpect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he ſought to hinder his coming thither in perſon, leſt the People hearing the Promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, ſhould preſently be won with his gentle words, and finiſh the Bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Council, bitterly complaining againſt theſe jugling tricks: and Aratus was not far behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Aſſembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all as it were to Fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their preſent weakneſs, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly, many he forced, and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wan

Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own Son to Antigonus, entreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achæans. Antigonus gave as good words as could be wished: saving that he utterly refused to do any thing, unless he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the Horse against his Enemy the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himself to be sadled and bridled. Aratus was herewithal contented, but wanted all honest colour to do it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found, for that the Corinthians perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilest this was in doing, he took special order that Aratus his House and Goods within the Town, should be safely kept for the Owner, to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians and Illyrians to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he give him double the same Pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolomy. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the Gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured Soveraignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own Son as an Hostage to Antigonus, and laboured with the Achæans to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seised upon the Goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Country of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Isthmus; having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the Sreights of Thermopylæ against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this Journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance, and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battel, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force, but he was not able so to do: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally, he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the Gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his Enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been Enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of Friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his Victory, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all Debters to be discharged from their Creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannical, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths-men, and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achæans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces the Rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the Enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood, by continual Messages, that his men which held the Citadel at Argos were almost lost: he began to fear, lest his labour in guarding the entry, should grow frivolous; the Achæans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust Fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos; that both Argives and Achæans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the Streets: when the Horse-men of Antigonus were discovered a-far off, hasting to relieve the Citizens, and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia, losing in short space all, or most, of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans: to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behind with him, but made him Captain General over them and their Confederates, and further entred into Covenant with him, That they should not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane Honors, as sacrifices, and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if instead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achæans. This was hardly taken, yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected, when the Statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the Statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left left unto himself at his earnest entreaty. It might therefore appear, that this God was also spightful. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the aid of these Macedonians. For with extream Torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards General of the Achæans; and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantinæans, for their Ingratitude and Cruelty shewed to the Achæans. For he slew all the principal Citizens, and sold the rest, Men, Women, and Children, all for Bond-slaves: dividing the Spoyl; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The Town it self was given by Antigonus to the Argives: who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this Cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the Flattery, which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of Servility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speak of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Civil state of the Achæans, let us return unto his War against the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinæa, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphusa. Mantinæa he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achæans: with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinæa, and to those other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and not money enough to wage more. Ptolomy the Ægyptian promised much, but would perform nothing, unless he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his Children in pledge. These were sent into Ægypt; yet the Aid came not. For Ptolomy was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his minds sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumised all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedæmonian Slaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his Forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis, that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous Times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The Town he wan: but after he was entred, all that were fit to bear Arms, rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and Goods to them again, if they would be of his Party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great Booty that he found therein. These News astonished the Achæans at Ægium: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering Places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their Lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of this unlucky Winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achæans. When he had layn a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the Gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Countrey would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the Field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser, than to be moved with their Clamours; and suffered them to see their Villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector, unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with fooliſh words, rather than he would be overcome in Fight, and thereby lose more Honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the Reputation of his Enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for War, Antigonus gathered together all his Troops, meaning to requite these Bravado's of his Enemy, with the Conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keep the War from his own Gates; and therefore entred upon the Countrey of Argos, where he made such havock, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended Invasion of Laconia. Many great Affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging over the Countrey of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtus; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the Suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in scorn, to borrow the Keys. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the Achæan side, and to fill the Enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard, of things abroad, and to put all to hazard, by setting up his rest, without more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans, and their Friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus coming to Selasia, found his Enemy so strongly incamped, upon and between the Hills of Eva and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assayling their well-defenced Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other, Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Eva: but his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan Foot, that the Spartan Horse, and light-armed Foot, incamped in the streight Valley between those Hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts; and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the Battel, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Euclidas, his Brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopœmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on Horse, as a private young man, among the Achæans. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them, perſwaded the Captains of the Achæan Horſe, to break upon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly deſpiſing his youth, and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they ſhould keep their Places, until they received a ſign from him, which was not as yet. Philopæmen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well adviſed, entreated ſome of his own Countreymen to follow him; gave a charge upon the Spartans; and forced them not only to leave the Illyrians, but ſeek how to ſave themſelves. Being ſo far advanced, he found the Place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulneſs of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perſwaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifeſt, who kept the top of the Hill, and ſtirred not to hinder thoſe that aſcended, but waited for them in a Plain, where they might fight upon even terms. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was ſore hurt, yet he made good the Place that he had gotten, until the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great ſlaughter of them in their deſcent. This overthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleomenes loſe the day: who fighting bravely on the other ſide, upon Olympus, againſt Antigonus himſelf, was like to have been ſurrounded and loſt, if he had not withdrawn himſelf with an extraordinary ſpeed. In this Battel, ended the glory of Lacedæmon; which, as a Light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, ſhined more brightly of late, than in many Ages paſt.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta: where he had no deſire to ſtay, finding only two hundred left, of ſix thouſand Spartans that he had led unto this Battel, and moſt of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perſwaded his people to yield themſelves unto Antigonus; and promiſing to do all that ſhould at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he haſted away to the Sea-ſide (where he had Shipping long before provided, againſt all that might happen) and imbarqued himſelf for Ægypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolomy Evergetes; who undertook to reſtore him to his Kingdom; and (perhaps) meant no leſs, as being much delighted with his gallant Behaviour and Qualities. In the mean ſeaſon he had a Penſion allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolomy died; and his Son Ptolomy Philopater ſucceeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and baſe Men, unmindful of all Vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was deſirous to return into Greece, whither the Troubles in Peloponneſus did ſeem to invite him, Ptolomy, and his Minions, would neither give him aid, nor yet dared to diſmiſs him (as he deſired) to try his own Friends in Greece, becauſe he was too well acquainted with the weakneſs of Ægypt: nor well knew how to detain him againſt his will. At length they deviſed matter againſt him, and made him Priſoner. The laſt act of him was; that with thirty of his Countreymen, he undertook a deſperate Enterprize: breaking out of the Priſon, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebel, and ſeek their liberty. In which Attempt he ſlew ſome Enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the Streets, without reſiſtance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very ſtrange, to fight againſt him on the King's behalf) He, and his Companions, agreed together to be Miniſters of their own Death. Upon his dead Body Ptolomy was bold to ſhew his Indignation: and ſlew his Mother and Children, that had been ſent thither as Hoſtages, together with the Wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had cauſed Agis, with his Mother and Grandmother, to come to ſuch a bloudy end, as now befel his own Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the Victory at Sellaſia, Antigonus without reſiſtance entred Sparta: whereinto never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Laws and Government: tarrying there no longer, than two or three days; after which he haſtened out of Peloponneſus, and never returned. The cauſe of his ſpeedy departure was, an Advertiſement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran, and deſtroyed the Countrey. Had theſe News come a little ſooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the Fight, a few days longer, or at leaſt-wiſe tarried, a few days after the Fight, in Sparta, the Kingdom of Lacedæmon would have ſtood, and perhaps have extended it ſelf over all Greece. But God had otherwiſe determined.

Antigonus fought a great Battel with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-ſtraining his voice; wherewith he brake a Vein that bled inwardly, and in ſhort ſpace finiſhed his Life, who was troubled before with a Conſumption of the Lungs. His Kingdom deſcended unto Philip, the Son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as alſo about the ſame time it was, that Antiochus, ſirnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomy Philopater, began to reign in Aſia, and Ægypt; Boys all. Of theſe, Ptolomy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he firſt was King, yet continued a Boy, all the ſeventeen years of his Reign. The unripe Age of Philip and Antiochus, bred ſuch inteſtine Inconvenience to their Kingdoms, as is uſual in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occaſion, when it comes, we ſhall more ſeaſonably ſpeak of them, and of their Kingdoms, more at large.

§. VII.

How the Illyrians infeſted the Coaſt of Greece; and how they were ſubdued by the Romans.

WHilſt things thus paſſed in Greece; and whilſt the Carthaginians were buſie in their conqueſt of Spain, the Romans had found themſelves work among the Sardinians and Corſicans, that were eaſily ſubdued at firſt, and eaſily vanquiſhed again, when they rebelled. They made alſo War with the Illyrians, wherein they got much Honour with little pain. With the Gaules they had much ado, that laſted not long; being rather, as Livy ſaith, a Tumult than a War. So that by all theſe light Exerciſes, their valour was hardly kept from ruſt. How they got the Iſlands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath been ſhewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be utterly ſilent. Liv. l. 21.

The Illyrians inhabited the Countrey, now called Slavonia: a troubleſom Nation, impatient of reſt, and continually making War for gain, without other regard of Friend or Foe. They were invited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians, his Friends, that were beſieged by the Ætolians, for that they refuſed to be of their ſociety. Before the Illyrian Succours came, the Mydionians were ſo far ſpent, that the Ætolians contended about the Booty: the old Prætor, or chief Magiſtrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, claiming to have the honour of the Victory, and the diviſion of the Spoyl to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the Siege to an end, and won the Town: others, that were in hope to be choſen into the Office, contradicting this, and deſiring that old Orders might be kept. It was a pretty ſtrife, and ſomewhat like to that of the French in later Ages, who thought upon dividing the Prey, before they had won the Victories, which anon they loſt, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Ætolians wiſely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, ſhould be joyntly entitled in the Victory, and have equal Authority, in diſtribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finiſhed the ſtrife much more elegantly, and after another faſhion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians; and though good reſiſtance was made, yet got the Victory, partly by force of their own multitude, partly by help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own buſineſs, but ſtoutly ſallied out of the Town. Many of the Ætolians were ſlain, more were taken, their Camp and all their Baggage was loſt: the Illyrians took the Spoyl, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophy, inſcribing the Names, both of their old and new Magiſtrate (for they alſo choſe new Officers at the ſame time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The ſucceſs of this Voyage, highly pleaſed Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his aſſiſtance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquiſhed the ſtouteſt of the Greeks, he found it not uneaſie, to enrich himſelf by ſetting upon the leſs warlike. For joy of this, he feaſted, and drank ſo immoderately, that he fell into a Pleuriſie, which in few days ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left unto Teuta, his Wife.

Teuta gave her people free liberty to rob all Nations at Sea, making no difference between Friend and Foe; as if ſhe had been ſole Miſtreſs of the ſalt Waters. She armed a Fleet, and ſent it into Greece: willing her Captains, to make War where they found advantage, without any further reſpect. Theſe fell with the Weſtern Coaſt of Poloponneſus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Meſſenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and ſtayed at the City of Phœnice, to take in Victuals and other Neceſſaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gaules; that having been Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, firſt Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheleſs revolted, and were for their miſ-deeds diſarmed, and ſent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by theſe Epirots, and truſted to lie in Garriſon within their Town. The Gaules were ſoon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which deſerved none other, in truſting them. All Epirus was preſently in Arms, and haſtned to drive out theſe unwelcom gueſts. But whilſt the Epirots lay before the Town, there came News into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdilaidas; whom Queen Teuta had ſent to help his fellows. Upon this Advertiſement, a part of them is ſent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Town, and the ſtreights adjoyning, by which theſe new comers muſt enter into their Countrey, another part of them remains at Phœnice, to continue the ſiege. Neither the one nor the other ſped well in their buſineſs. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyn with his fellows; and they that were beſieged within Phœnice, ſallied out of the Town, and gave ſuch an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them deſpair of ſaving their Countrey, without great and ſpeedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embaſſadors were ſent to the Achæans and Ætolians; craving their help, with very pitiful terms of entreaty. They obtained their ſuit: neither was it long, before an Army, ſent by theſe two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to preſent battel unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home, by Letters from Teuta the Queen, that ſignified a Rebellion of ſome Illyrians againſt her: ſo that he had no mind to put his Forces to hazzard, but offered compoſition; which was accepted. The Agreement was, That the Epirots might ranſom their Town, and all their people that were Priſoners; and that the Illyrians ſhould quietly depart, with all their booty and ſlaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own Countrey by Land, ſending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no ſuch great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occaſioned in this Voyage. For in fulfilling the Commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilſt they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints made unto the Roman Senate, were ſo frequent, that Embaſſadors were ſent to require of Teuta, that ſhe ſhould abſtain from doing ſuch injuries. Theſe Embaſſadors found her very jolly; both for the riches which her Fleet had brought in, and for that ſhe had, in ſhort ſpace, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, ſave only the Town of Iſſa, which her Forces held ſtreightly beſieged. Swelling with this proſperity, ſhe could hardly afford a good look to the unmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true Name, Pyracie, required amends. Yet when their Speech was ended, ſhe vouchſafed to tell them, That injury in publick ſhe would do them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings, to forbid their Subjects to get Commodity, how they beſt could, by Sea. But (ſaid the younger of the two Embaſſadors) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take Revenge in publick, of thoſe private Wrongs, that are born out by publick Authority: therefore we ſhall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. Theſe Words the Queen took ſo impatiently, that no revenge could ſatisfie her, but the death of him that had ſpoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the Common Law of Nations, ſhe cauſed him to be ſlain: as if that had been the way to ſet her heart at reſt; which was indeed the mean to diſquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this out-rage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, conſiſting of two hundred Sail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Poſthumus. They trouble not themſelves any more, with requiring ſatisfaction. for this injury is of ſuch nature, as muſt be requited with mortal War. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to uſe violence towards Embaſſadors: the reaſon and ground whereof, ſeems seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of war and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should pass freely, and in safety between Enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold upon Embassadors sent by their Enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrel; then is it as lawful, to use violence to those Embassadors (thus imployed, to make the War more terrible) as it is to kill the men of War, and Subjects, of an Enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it, when they slew the Lacædemonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true Office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of Amity; if it be not lawful for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much less may an Embassador do it, without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no priviledg at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassador Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an error; that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and less than she, both before and since: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the Name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had she easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much, by odds of Number, as by Valour, or skill in Arms; she would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her self. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission, to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it self; and one part of it fell with [a] Dyrrachium; the other, with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In [b] Corcyra the Illyrians landed; wasted the Isle, and besieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achæans were called in to help: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of less note, Marcus Caryneusis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Corcyra, dismaied with this Overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius Pharius; who took possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the mean season, Teuta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to try any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consul, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consul sailed thither; where he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consul sailed alongst the coast, to [c] Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he used thenceforth as his counsellor and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consul, with the Land-Army, numbred at twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but upon news of the Roman Army, they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea; take Twenty of their Ships; and enforce the Queen Teuta to forsake the coast, and to cover her self in Rison, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; an other part stays behind, and prosecutes the War, in such sort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace: which she obtained upon miserable Conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay Tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, never send any of her Ships of War, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two Vessels, unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian War, the Romans sent Embassadors into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to the Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made War with good success upon Teuta, and her people. They hoped belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vain Greeks, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little Acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the War between the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

THE Gaules that dwelt in Lumbardy, were the next, against whom the Romans took Arms. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they took Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that War proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times, their success was variable, and commonly bad. Many Overthrows they received; and if they got any Victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce, than well advised: lightly stirred up to War, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, less than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them:

yet gave always careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was ſudden and uncertain; by reaſon of their Neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their Attempts upon Rome, were called Wars, but tumultus Gallici; tumults of the Gaules; and rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italy, and uſed to riſe with great Armies: but after a few days march, and ſometimes before their ſetting forth, any ſmall occaſion ſerved to diſperſe them. Having received an Overthrow; they would reſt ten or twelve years, ſometimes twenty or thirty: till they were ſtirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whileſt they reſted, the ſtate of Rome, that againſt theſe made only defenſive War, had leiſure to grow, by ſetting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raiſe: that the Gaules never fell upon Italy, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous War. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilſt Pyrrhus was travelling in the ſame enterpriſe; or in either of the two former Punick Wars; it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious City. But it ſeems that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than ſtrangers had in Gaule. At leaſt, they knew not how to uſe their times: and were therefore like to ſmart, whenſoever the Enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, ſhould find leiſure to viſit them at their own home: which was now after the firſt Punick War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to ſet upon the Gaules in their own Country: and that was three years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, invading Hetruria, and beſieging Arretium, had won a great battel, and ſlain L. Cæcilius with the moſt of his Army. Manius Curius the new Conſul, ſent Embaſſadors to them, to treat about ranſom of Priſoners. But theſe Embaſſadors they ſlew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it ſo well, that they expelled theſe Senones out of their Country, and ſent a Colony of their own to inhabit it. This cauſed the [e] Boij, another people of Gaule, to fear the like meaſure: who thereupon took Arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their ſide. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battels; and thereby made them ſue for peace, which laſted until this end of the Illyrian war.

It vexed the Gaules, to ſee a Roman Colony planted in their Countrey; who had been accuſtomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Tranſalpines (ſo the Romans called thoſe in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes; though to us they are nearer; like as they called Ciſalpines, or by hither the Alpes, thoſe who dwele between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reaſonably preſuming, that as their diſjunction had cauſed their loſs, ſo their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the buſineſs was ſo fooliſhly carried, that the Ciſalpines and Tranſalpines, fell together by the ears: putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of War. Soon after, they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more ſubſtantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propoſed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, beſides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more ſhould be carried thither, as would ſerve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly thoſe Gaules. Such an Offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it ſelf, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in ſo good part, notwithſtanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadful Preſident extremely diſpleaſed the Boij: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like diſplantation. And becauſe all the reſt of the Gaules had reaſon to reſolve, that themſelves alſo ſhould be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Inſubrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joyned with the Boij, and upon a common purſe entertained the Geſſates, Nations about Rhodannus, wageable as the Switzers in theſe times. The Geſſates having received a great Impreſt, come to the Field under the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus and Aneroeſtus: who with the Boij and Inſubrians, compound an Army of Fifty thouſand Foot, and twenty thouſand horſe, and thoſe of the beſt men, and beſt appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom, the Seno-galli, that had been beaten out of their poſſeſſions, gave a great increaſe of ſtrength. On the contrary ſide, the Venetians, and the [f] Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better believing in their proſperity and riſing fortune. For fear of whoſe incurſions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: With the reſt of their forces they entred into Tuſcane. The Romans hearing of this danger, ſend Æmilius to Rimine, to ſtop their paſſage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Conſul, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuſcane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the conſideration of this powerful Army, which the Gaules had aſſembled, they cauſed a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of thoſe of their Allies: who were no leſs willing than themſelves, to oppoſe the incurſions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cauſe, that their own deſtruction could not be prevented otherwiſe, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers found in this Muſter, deſerve to be recorded; becauſe they ſet out the power of the Romans in thoſe days. With the Conſuls, they ſent forth to the War four Legions of their own; every Legion conſiſting of five thouſand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horſe; and of their Allies, thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe. There were alſo appointed for Supplies (if any miſadventure came to theſe) of the Sabines and Hetrurians, fifty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe; which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Sarſinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twenty thouſand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twenty thouſand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the general Army of the Gaules ſhould be thereby greatly diminiſhed. There were beſides theſe, to be ready againſt all uncertain chances of War, thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, garriſon'd in Rome it ſelf, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Over and above theſe great Troops, in the Roll of the Latines, that was ſent unto the Senate, there were numbred fourſcore thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe; in that of the Samnites, ſeventy thouſand foot, and of horſe ſeven thouſand; in that of the Iapyges, and Meſſapges, fifty thouſand foot, and thirteen thouſand horſe; the Lucans ſent a liſt

[e] There were divers Nations of the Boij; as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germany, in Bourbonnois in France, and in Aquitane; but theſe Boij were of the French race, and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the River of Po.

[f] Cenomanni, are the people about Bergamo, on the North-ſide of the River Po in Italy. There were alſo of theſe Cenomani in France, and inhabited the Countrey of Main.

[g] Iappyges & Meſſapges ſeem to be one Nation, whoſe alſo called Salentines, Peucetians, Apulians, and Calabrians. The Countrey is now Apulia, containing the Northermoſt heal-land of Calabria.

a list of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the [h] Marsi, [i] Marrucini, [k] Ferentani, and the Vestini, of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand four hundred foot, and four hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to bear Arms, there were registred two hundred and fifty thousand foot; and of horse, three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and about six thousand Horse. Casting up the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to seven hundred thousand foot, and seventy thousand horse. But the Number is somewhat mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himself by the dead pays: for where he reckons Nine Hundred Horse too many, he falls short Nine Thousand Two Hundred of the Foot.

[h] A people of the Kingdom of Naples. [i] Ptolomy calls them a people of Italy. [k] A people of Campania, called to this day Ferentines, saith Leander.

How great soever this Muster was, it seems to have been like unto that which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewes the Twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himself, and his Subjects, he took a Roll of all persons able to bear Arms, within the Dutchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth part of them into the Field. Certain it is, that the Battels of Trebia, Trasymene, and Cannæ, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans fain to arm their slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Cannæ. Wherefore the marvel is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all Heads are not fit for Helmets; though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keep on their way: and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the Field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had missed of them, came again fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head; and in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem; that shewed no great fineness of Wit, but such as well be-seemed those that had none other Occupation than War; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the Night, they cause their Foot to march away, but not far; leaving their Horse in guard; to whom they give Order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a Retreat, as if they had not dared to abide battel. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure, as the Gaules desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules return; charge them; and kill six thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themselves, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Upon the coming of the Consul, the Gaules consult whether they should give the Romans battel, or forbear. In which dispute, Anæroestus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to return into their own Countries; where after they had disposed of the great spoils and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the War, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This advice they all embrace; for seeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoils of their enemies; they thought it wisdom, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it before the Enemy had been in sight. But as well in the Wars of these latter Ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extreme dangerous, to make a Retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn head; yet in always going on from the pursuing Enemy, they find within a few miles, either streight, hedg, ditch, or place of disadvantage, which they are inforced to pass in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows it, as well as the Captain, that he which forsakes the Field, perceives, and fears some advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possest the heart of man, it casteth thence both Courage and Understanding. They that make the Retreat, are always in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be engaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the Retreat, be not held to it by men of great Courage. The miserable Overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503. upon a Retreat made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no less. For although a great Troop of French Horse, sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the Foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish Foot over-took, and defeated them utterly. During the Wars between the Imperials and the French, Boisi and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs see the Enemy before they left the Field. So was Strossi overthrown by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded to dislodg the Night before the Marques his Arrival. Therefore did the French King, Francis the first, wisely; when without respect of point of Honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by Night; as many other, the most advised Captains, (not finding themselves in case to give battel) have done. Ie ne trouve point (saith the Marshal Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retrait; I find nothing in the art of war so difficult, as to make a safe retreat. A sure Rule it is, that there is less dishonour to dislodg in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof Mr. de la Noue gives this judgment of a days retreat made in France, presently before the battel of Moncountour. For (saith he) staying upon our Reputation, in shew not to dislodg by night, we lost our Reputation indeed, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruin. And yet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncountour with so great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded, of which my self was an Eye-witness; and was one of them that had cause to thank him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the safe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turn their backs to the Enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilius follows them, as near as he can, without engaging himself, attending his advantage. In the mean while C. Atilius, the other Consul, with the Legions of

Sar-

Sardinia, lands at Piſa; ſo as the Gaules, incloſed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally ſtrengthen their Rear and Front. To ſuſtain Æmilius, they appoint the Geſſates, and the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the reſt of the Gaules inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the Fight Polybius deſcribeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and ſo did Atilius the Conſul: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Aneroeſtus, with forty thouſand of their Vaſſals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gaules loſt courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the year following this Overthrow, by the new Conſuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to uſe their Victory: they gave not ten, twenty, or thirty years time to the Gaules, to repair their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. Theſe new Conſuls beat the Boij; but by reaſon of the great Rains that fell, and the great Peſtillence that reigned, they were compelled for that preſent to ſurceaſe. In the ſecond year, Furius, and Flaminius, invade the Milanois; and prevail very far, being ſtrongly aſſiſted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Nevertheleſs theſe Conſuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to reſign their Office: becauſe the Augures, or Soothſayers, had found, that ſome token or other of the Birds (in which, and all ſorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely ſuperſtitious) had not only fore-ſhewed little good, when they were choſen, but had alſo nullified the Election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this revocation, from the Senate, and being otherwiſe advertiſed of the Contents, was not haſty to open them: but firſt gave battel unto the Enemies, vanquiſhed them, and ſpoiled their Countrey; then peruſed the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, ſore againſt the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he ſided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Countrey of the Senones among the pople of Rome. He was the firſt, or one of the firſt, that underſtanding the Majeſty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwiſe in the Senate, than by way of Delegacy, or grand Commiſſion; did not ſtand highly upon his Birth and Degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and uſe their power, over himſelf, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their diſorders. For this the Commons highly eſteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the ſurer ſide: and found imitators, that roſe by the ſame Art; which in proceſs of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being depoſed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were choſen Conſuls for the reſt of that year. The Gaules about this time deſired peace, and were like to have obtained it; though the new Conſuls were againſt it, as fearing to want work. But when thirty thouſand of the Geſſates, following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyned with the Inſubrians: all other diſcourſe, than of preſent War, was at an end. So the Conſuls haſted into their Province, where they beſieged Acerræ, a Town not far from Novaro (ſo far had the Romans pierced already) in the Dutchy of Milan. To divert them from this Siege, Britomarus ſate down before Claſtidium, a Town in the ſame Tract, with great part of his forces; leaving the reſt with the Inſubrians, to attend upon the Conſuls at Acerræ, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not ſuffice, to make the Romans break up their Siege: Marcellus, taking with him the greateſt part of the Horſe, and ſix Hundred Foot lightly armed; thought to deal well enough with thoſe at Claſtidium. Britomarus heard of the Conſuls coming; and met him upon the way; ſo ſuddenly, that the Romans had no leiſure to reſt themſelves after their journey, but were compelled inſtantly to fight. Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a raſh bravery, loſt his game at a caſt. He had advantage enough in number, both of Horſe and Foot: but he thought ſo well of his own perſonal valour, that he rode out ſingle before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no leſs daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wiſe in this action, I will not diſpute; he was more fortunate, and that ſufficed to commend him. He ſlew and diſarmed Britomarus, in preſence of both Armies: whereby his own men took ſuch courage, and his Enemies were ſo diſmaied, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great Victory.

This was the third and laſt time, that ever any Roman General ſlew the General of the Enemies with his own Hand. To this kind of Victory belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Coſſus, and this Marcellus had the Honour: yet I dare lay, that the two Scipio's, and divers other Roman Captains, eſpecially Cæſar, were better men of War than any of theſe three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Optima ſpolia; The Armour of a General ſlain by themſelves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected ſo to do.

After this Victory, Acerræ was yielded to the Romans, and Milan ſoon after; with all that belonged to the Ciſalpines or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardy. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for ſo many years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City it ſelf, brought to nothing in a ſhort time; their pleaſant and fertile Territory poſſeſt by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, ſo many as would not ſubject their Necks to the Roman Yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themſelves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlaws and Thieves. And thus did the Romans ſpend the three and twenty years, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at ſuch leiſure, that they cloſed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it ſtanding always open, when they had any War, ſave once, in the Reign of Numa; nor in long time after, until the Reign of Auguſtus. But this their preſent Happineſs was not to laſt long: a dangerous War, and perhaps the greateſt that had ever been, was to come unto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

Chap. III.

Of the second Punick War.

§. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum; whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the Son of Amilcar, was about six and twenty years old, when he was chosen General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army as soon as Asdrubal was dead: and the Election was ratified by the State at Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine Family (so called of Amilcar, whose Surname was Barcas) that had command in chief, over the Men of War. Which honour would perhaps have been less envied by these domestical Enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine House, had not also born the whole sway in Government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This general Good-will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar, in saving his Country from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with Treasures and great Revenews; so was it retained by the same good Arts among his Friends and Followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to tax the vertue of their Enemies, that was unreproveable, nor to perform the like services unto the Common-weal, had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the general reprehension of War, and cautelous advice of not provoking the Romans. This they seasoned other whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine Faction went about to oppress the Liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious to bear ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no less Barchine than Hannibal himself. For it was long since apparent, that the Oath of the Romans to the Articles of Peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were she never so quiet and officious, unless she would yield to become their Subject. Since therefore the Peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could find some good advantage, to renew the War: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their own State was in good case, the War should begin, than that in some unhappy time of Famine or Pestilence, or after some great loss of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their Enemies; and to give away basely their Lands and Treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon terms of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his Father, and other Friends, had long time devised of this business) that in making War with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without molestation, there was good hope that he should find Friends and Assistants, even of those People that helped to increase the Roman Armies in forreign Wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to hear that he had set the War on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great Enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his design. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might seem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignity of that Spanish Towns alliance with their false Friends. So should he assay both the patience of his Enemies, and the disposition of his own Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he nevertheless went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approached unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livy) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the War against Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needful to finish the Conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore he entred upon the Territory of the * Olcades, and having besieged Althæa (Livy calleth it Carteia) their chief City, he became, in a few days, Master not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he first undertook, being subdued, and the Winter at hand, he rested his Army in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the Spoils he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the War against the [a] Vaccæi: and without any great difficulty, wan first Salmantica, now called Salamanca, and after it, [b] Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long Siege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the heighth, both of his Courage, and of his Martial Judgment. For all such of the Vaccæi, as were able to bear Arms, being made desperate by the spoil of their Country, with those of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had escaped in the late Overthrow, joyning themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men; and stayed Hannibal on the Banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourn in Portugal. These four Nations having had experience of Hannibals

* A People (saith Stephanus) near the River of Ebro. But in the old description of Spain, in Ortelius, they are found near Tagus; and by Suidas, not far from New Carthage.

[a] A People of Castile the old.

[b] Arbucala, or Albricala, an Inn and City of the Vaccei in Aragon.

Hannibals invincible Courage, and that he never ſaw Enemy, upon whom he durſt not give charge, were throughly reſolved, that his natural Valour would at this time no leſs neglect the cold advice of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to do, when the like great occaſion perſwaded him to uſe it. But he that makes himſelf a body of Cryſtal, that all men may look through him, and diſcern all the parts of his diſpoſition; makes himſelf (withal) an Aſs: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wiſe men, though they have ſingle hearts in all that is juſt and vertuous, yet they are like Coffers with double bottoms: which when others look into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, on the ſudden, and at once. It is true, that this ſubtil Carthaginian, when he ſerved under Aſdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the moſt adventurous. But that which may beſeem a Captain, or inferiour Commander, doth not always become a Chief, though it hath ſometimes ſucceeded well with ſuch great ones, as have been found more fortunate than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of War knew as well how to diſſemble his Courage, as at other times to make it good. For he withdrew himſelf from the River ſide, as if fearful to ford it, thereby to draw over that great Multitude from their Banks of advantage. The Spaniards apprehending this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould, thruſt themſelves in fury and diſorder into the ſwift Stream, with a purpoſe to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defences on the contrary ſide. But when Hannibal ſaw them in their way, and well-near over, he turned back his Elephants, to entertain them at their landing, and thruſt his Horſe-men both above and beneath them, into the River. Theſe, carrying a kind of Lance de gay, ſharp at both ends, which they held in the midſt of the Staff; had ſuch an advantage over the Foot that were in the River under their ſtroaks, clattered together, and unable to move or ſhift their Bodies, as on firm ground, that they ſlew all thoſe (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were allready entred into the Water, and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed, with ſo great a ſlaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard on that ſide the River of Iberus (the Seguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines perceiving the danger towards them, cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, and bemoaned themſelves, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeed, only becauſe of their Alliance and Friendſhip with this honorable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This Tale moved the Senate, but much more a report that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome cry out, that War ſhould be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carried it. So it was only concluded, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent into Spain, to view the State of the Confederates: which were indeed none other than the Seguntines. For if Hannibal intended War againſt Rome, it was likely that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plauſible occaſion to take Arms againſt him: if he had no ſuch purpoſe; yet would it be in their Power, to determine what they liſted themſelves; upon the report of theſe Embaſſadors, and this their Gravity, in being not too raſh at firſt, would ſerve to countenance their following Decree. Of theſe Embaſſadors Livy reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where alſo they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Hiſtorian of ſincerity leſs queſtionable, tells, that they found him at Carthagena, and had conference with him, though ſuch as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the reſt of Hannibal his whole courſe. And ſurely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians ſhould afterwards admit a more peremptory Embaſſage (as Livy confeſſeth) and fall to diſputation about the Covenants of Peace; if they had rejected that which was ſent upon none other pretence, than prevention of War.

Whilſt the Embaſſadors paſſed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his Forces, but ſome Roman pretences againſt Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or People that ſhould do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his help againſt the Saguntines. Theſe were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, and having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himſelf had hatched ſome. Finding therefore ſuch an occaſion, whatſoever it was, as made him able to ſay, that the Seguntines had firſt provoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more ado, but ſate down with his whole Power before their Town. He was now more ſecure, than he had formerly been, of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Ambaſſadors, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheleſs, he was glad of any handſome colour to ſhadow his actions: not only becauſe the War, which he ſo much deſired, was not proclaimed, but that he might not be checked in his courſe, as an open Enemy, before he could ſet foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary deſire. They were glad of the Quarrel: as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, ſhould thereby in ſhort ſpace become their own. Yet were they not haſty to threaten, before they were ready to ſtrike; but, meant to temporize until they had an Army in readineſs to be ſent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum the Seat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled againſt them: either for that he found himſelf over-ſtreightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather becauſe he was of an unthankful diſpoſition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the Fame of the Carthaginian War, emboldened him to deſpiſe his Benefactors and Patrons, whom he ought to have defended and aided in all Perils, even with the hazard of his whole Eſtate, which he had received of their Gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kind, with thoſe that had rewarded him for being ſuch. Firſt, he built Ships, and ſpoiled the Iſles of Greece: againſt the Covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and ſeiſed upon ſome places that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun ſooner, or rather if he had ſtayed ſomewhat longer, he might have ſped better. For the buſineſs with the Gauls was ended, with Hannibal not throughly begun, when he declared himſelf, by his doings, an Enemy, and was vanquiſhed. The Roman Conſul, Æmilius, was ſent againſt him: who in ſeven days wan the ſtrong Town of Dimalum, and thereby brought ſuch terror terror upon the Country round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places to yield themselves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which it might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Army in the Isle of Pharus by night, and bestowed them in covert, presenting himself the next morning with twenty Ships before the Town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his Power issued out against the Consul, and was soon intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through By-paths, to a Creek where he had Shipping ready for him, and embarked himself, leaving all his Estate unto them, of whose Liberality he first had it.

This business, though it were soon dispatched, yet prevented it not the Siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sate down, ere Æmilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the Siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave Sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their General received a dangerous Wound in the Thigh, that caused him to lie many days unable to move. Nevertheless he was not unmindful of his Work in the mean while; but gave order to raise certain moveable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the Walls of the City, and to prepare to batter the Curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of Wall; whereat an hot assault was given: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the Breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which upon the first fury they had won, but they were pursued even to their own Trenches and Camp. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did so weary the Townsmen with continual travail, that at length it got within the Walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the City, by some Counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himself out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the Conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so severe, and without all compassion of Honour, as Alcon durst not return to propound them to his Countrymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; Gold, Silver, Plate, and other Riches within the City: yea, the City it self to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assign some other place for their Habitation: not allowing them to carry out with them any other thing wherewith to sustain themselves, than the Cloaths on their backs; or other Arms to defend them, than their Nails and Teeth. Yet might they far better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their Lives, and saved the Honour of their Wives and Daughters) than to have rested at the discretion of the Conqueror, as soon after they did, by whom their Wives and Daughters were deflowred before their faces; and all put to Sword that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort which a great number of them took, when not daring to fight, and sell their Blood at the deerest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched Creatures, in their own Houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying unrevenged. The Treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Army: the Slaves and other Booty, he divided among his Souldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his Friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

These Tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their own slowness, in forbearing to send help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking still for succour in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their Honour, by taking sharp revenge. To this end they sent Embassadors again to Carthage, demanding only, Whether it were by general consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made War upon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answer was made in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian Speaker) whether the General of our Army in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his own Counsel; or whether he did it by direction from us, it is not the Question which the Romans ought to ask us. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is, Whether it were lawful, or unlawful, for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their Faults and Errors; to you, to challenge us if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our Negotiation with Lutatius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the Peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last Agreement between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say that the Saguntines were comprehended by Name; it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lutatius, to your own disadvantage, you cast it upon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawful for the Romans to disavow the Actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and precise Warrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour to perform those bargains which Asdrubal hath made for us, without our commandment and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meer Cavil. For Lutatius the Consul, in his Treaty of Peace with the Carthaginians, had expresly referred the allowance thereof to the People of Rome. It had been therefore much better to have dealt plainly, and to have alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withal, of twelve hundred Talents: which Perjury, the State of Carthage being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into Confederacy, and forthwith inserted their Names into the Treaty of Peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Asdrubal, and all other Business between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman Injuries; as implying this Commination, Do whatsoever we require, else will we make War, without regard of our Oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledg, forgetting, in heat of Contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Livy himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did enflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge, we may reasonably think, that the mention of this Injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrel, to shew that the War, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Ambassadors, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his Gown, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short Reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Even which of them you your self have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and shake it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each Part had resolved to make War, it was meerly frivolous. For all these Disputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the Party unwilling, or unable to sustain the War. The rusty Sword, and the empty Purse, do always plead performance of Covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage; and commonly (seeing Peace between ambitious Princes, and States, is but a kind of breathing) the best-advised have rather begun with the Sword, than with the Trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henry the second, of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprize as many Places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the second, of Spain, with the English, when in the great Embargue he took all our Ships and Goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of Injuries received from these Enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his Journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by Oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred; and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father caused him to lay his Hand upon the Altar, and make this Vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath Hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soon as their Coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves Enemies to the People of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WAR being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put up his Sword, which he had drawn against the Saguntines, until he had therewith opened his passage unto the Gates of Rome. So began the second Punick War; second to none, that ever the Senate and People of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licenced his Spanish Souldiers to visit their Friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the mean while he gave Instructions to his Brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spain in his absence. He also took order, to send a great many Troops of Spaniards into Africk, to equal the numbers of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that so the one Nation might remain as Pledges and Gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteen thousand, eight hundred, and fifty Foot, and twelve hundred Horse; also eight hundred slingers of the * Baleares. Besides these, he selected four thousand Foot, all young men, and of quality, out of the best Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garrison'd in Carthage it self, not so much in regard of their Forces, as that they might serve for Hostages: for among those four thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their several States, had their Sons or Kinsmen. He also left with his Brother, to guard the Coast and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the War. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

* Majora & Minora

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africk, he sent Discoverers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Ambassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gaules, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his Forces, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Ambassadors, and Discoverers, being returned with good satisfaction, in the beginning of the Spring, he pass'd over the River of Iberus, with an Army consisting of fourscore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse. All those Parts of Spain, into which he had not entred before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno, (not that old Enemy of his House, who sate still at Carthage) to govern Spain on the East-side of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also do, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to pass, that the Journey seemed the less tedious unto those that accompa-companied him, as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand Foot, and nine thousand Horse, he pass'd the Pyrenees, and entred into Gaule. He found the Gaules that bordered upon Spain, ready in Arms, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but won them, with gentle speech, and rich Presents that he bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the Bank of Rhodanus, where dwelt, on each side of the River, a People called Volcæ. These were unacquainted with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keep him from passing over the Water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West-side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vivaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their Goods, into the Countrey of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further Bank against him, yet such as remained, being desirous to free their Countrey of so many ill Guests, were better pleased to have their Countreymen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own store of Corn and Cattel wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which Reason, they helped him to make Boats; informed him of another more easie passage, higher up the River; and lent him Guides. When the Vessels for Transportation of his Army were in readiness, he sent Hanno, the Son of Bomilcar, up the River, himself in the mean while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gaules unawares upon their own side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further Bank was won, though with some difficulty, and the Enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants, who marvellously feared the Water. He was therefore driven to make Rafts of Trees, and cover them with Earth and Turf; whereof he fastened one to each Bank, that might serve as a Bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, upon which the Beasts were towed over.

Having pass'd this first brunt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the Passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common Report made them; and from these he received Guides, with many other Encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himself extreamly incumbred by the Savoyans, and lost, both of his Carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other side. And whereas this Journey over the Mountains cost him fifteen days travel, he was every day, more or less, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withal, extreamly beaten with grievous Weather and Snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this Passage. But the fair and fertil Plains, which were now ready to receive them, with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper Forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory, gave them great comfort, and encouragement to go on: having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to overcome, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and Resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vain sollicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The Rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THE Countreys of Spain and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been sollicited before, by the same Roman Ambassadors, who had denounced the War at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spain in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to disswade them from contracting any Friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a People in Spain; from whom, in open Assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable Answer. With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the Friendship of the Carthaginians, seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith, and promised assistance, have been utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured Friends, and good Neighbours, as we, and other the People of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us, That for our parts (and so I think, I may answer for the rest of our Countreymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands, who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volcians, the Ambassadors took their way towards the Gaules, using their best Arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy, through their Territory: and withal greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to scorn, and had hardly the patience, to hear them speak. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italy, entertain a War which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the War among our selves, and in our own Territory, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, towards our ancient Enemies? Have the Romans deserved so well of us, and the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our own Houses, to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and Inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our Enemies, who have no way as yet offended us, nor we them.

With this unpleasing Answer the Ambassadors returned home, carrying no good News, of Friends likely to help them, but rather some assurance from the People of Massilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their Enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gave hasty proof. For when the News was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome, this alone sufficed to stir up the Boii, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These People were lately offended at the Plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand, they laid aſide all regard of thoſe Hoſtages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it ſeems that they could not win; for Hannibal ſhortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commiſſioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrey) to fly to Modena, where they beſieged them. The Siege of Modena had continued ſome ſmall time; when the Gaules, having little skill in aſſaulting Cities, waxed weary, and ſeemed deſirous to have peace, and to come to ſome good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpoſe, to draw on ſome Meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hoſtages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wiſh. For the Romans ſent out Ambaſſadors to treat with them, and to conclude a Peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in theſe Quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage, marched in all haſte to the relief of the Beſieged. But the Gaules, having laid a ſtrong Ambuſh in a Wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Prætor ſo opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the Place; a few excepted, that recovered, by faſt running, a little Village, but defenſible, upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was haſtily ſent, to relieve the Beſieged, with one Legion, and five thouſand of the Roman Aſſociates: which Forces were taken out of the Conſuls Army, and ſupplied by a new Levy.

As the Gaules were too raſh and haſty, ſo were the Romans too ſlow, and indeed too ill-adviſed, in the beginning of this War. They were not perſwaded, that Carthage, which had almoſt ſervilely endured ſo many Indignities, in time of the late Peace, would be ſo brave and couragious on the ſudden, as to attempt the Conqueſt of Italy it ſelf. Wherefore they appointed one of their Conſuls, to make War in Spain, the other in Africk: reſting ſecure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africk, with an hundred and threeſcore Quinqueremes, or Gallies, of five to an Oar; which preparation may ſeem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it ſhall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Conſul, made all poſſible haſte, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and uſed ſuch diligence, having the Wind alſo favourable, as in five days he recovered Maſſilia. There he was advertiſed, of Hannibal his having paſſed the River of Rhodanus; whom he thought to have found buſie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had alſo news of the Conſuls arrival: whereof he was neither glad, nor ſorry; as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them ſent forth Scouts, to diſcover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman Horſe. Theſe met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having ſlain only two hundred, and loſt of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians, he found, that they were gone three days before; and that (as he then found aſſuredly true) with an intent to look upon the Walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended Voyage into Spain. Nevertheleſs he ſent away thither his Brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greateſt part of his Fleet and Army, to try what might be done againſt Aſdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrey. He himſelf, taking with him a few choice Bands, returned by Sea to Piſa; and ſo paſſing through Tuſcane into Lombardy, drew together the broken Troops of Manlius and Atilius, that lately had been beaten by the Gaules: with which Forces he made Head againſt the Enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travel of his painful Journey.

§. IV.

Scipio the Roman Conſul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Conſuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great Battel at Trebia.

FIve months Hannibal had ſpent in his tedious Journey from Carthagena; what great Muſter he could make, when he had paſſed the Alpes, it is not eaſily found. Some reckon his Foot at an hundred thouſand, and his Horſe at twenty thouſand; others report them to have been only twenty thouſand Foot, and ſix hundred Horſe. Hannibal himſelf, in his Monument which he raiſed, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter Sum. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increaſed his Army, in ſhort ſpace. But when he marched Eaſtward from the Banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thouſand Foot, and eight thouſand Horſe; of which, all ſave thoſe remembred by himſelf in the Inſcription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have periſhed, by Diſeaſes, Enemies, Rivers, and Mountains; which miſchiefs had devoured, each, their ſeveral ſhares.

Having newly paſſed the Alpes, and ſcarce refreſhed his wearied Army in the Countrey of Piemont, he ſought to win the Friendſhip of the * Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held War at that time with the Inſubrians, which were his good Friends; and refuſed (perhaps for the ſame cauſe) his Amity. Wherefore he aſſaulted their Town, and wan it by force in three days. Their Spoyl ſerved well to hearten his Army; and their Calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour-places. So the Gaules, without more ado, fell unto his ſide: many for fear, many for good-will, according to their former inclination. This diſpoſition ran through the whole Countrey: which joyned, or was all in a readineſs to joyn, with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio the Conſul, his arrival, made ſome to be more adviſed, than the reſt. The Name of the Romans was terrible in thoſe Quarters; what was in the Carthaginians experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſul was already gotten through the moſt defenſible Paſſages, ere any ſpeech had been heard of his approach, many ſate ſtill, for very fear, who elſe would fain have concluded a League with theſe new-come Friends; and ſome, for greater fear, offered their ſervice againſt the Carthaginians, whom nevertheleſs they wiſhed well to ſpeed.

* Theſe dwelt about Turine, a goodly City, now ſubject unto the Duke of Savoy: which from them took the Name of Auguſta Taurinorum

This wavering Affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the tryal of a Battel. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition: Hannibal thinking it ſtrange, that the Conſul, whom he had left behind him on the other ſide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himſelf in the Plains; Scipio admiring the ſtrange adventure of paſſing thoſe Mountains, and the great ſpirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibal's ſucceſs, and ſudden arrival. Wherefore fore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste unto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia; giving him to understand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the War in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such Attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy it self. According to this Order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to land the Army at Ariminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so near, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best Arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed upon certain Prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having been no less miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withal so often scourged on their naked Bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be delivered from their miseries by any kind of present death; were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slain; with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause Lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftains of the Gaules were wont to use in single Combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his own lot might speed; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolvedly: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poor creatures were willing, upon whatsoever uneven terms, to rid themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the Victory had gotten his liberty, together with an Horse and Armour: but even him also, who being slain in Fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their General perceiving what impression this dumb shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their own condition, speaking to this effect. That he had laid before them an example of their own estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to run the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die or (which these Prisoners esteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetual slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himself any hope of life by flight; since the Mountains, the Rivers, the great distance from their own Countreys, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their own case; seeing there was never any in the World, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their Enemies. On the contrary, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own Soyl, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many ways to save themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withal, could no way entertain such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seems impossible) did no way press them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantial Argument, That there was no mean, between Victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captain of France) la commodite de la retracte advance la fuite; The commodity of a retreat, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio, on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a Bridge over the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to use the best Arguments and Reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great Conquests and Victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late War they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withal to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a Troop of Brigants and Thieves, than an Army like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the Men, nor Horses, had strength or courage to sustain the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (said he) ye your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after so many Travels and Miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had pass'd the Roane, their Horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himself, fearing our approach, ran head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a less dishonour, to die there by Frost, Famine, and Precipitation, than by the sharp Swords of the Romans, which had so often cut down his People, both in Africa, and in Sicil.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the gross of his Army, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him some light-armed Foot, to view the Ground, and the Enemies Countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other, Scipio sent before him his Horse-men of the Gaules, to begin the Fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their Troops, to assist them: himself with his Roman men at Arms, following softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to try the mettle of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their Foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for fear of being trodden down by the Enemies Horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the Fight, and did more hurt than they received: as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consul unmindful to relieve them: their hardiness deserving his aid; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needful. Wherefore he adventured himself so far, that he recei-received a dangerous Wound, and had been left in the place, if his Son (afterward ſurnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the Honour of this Reſcue to a Ligurian Slave. Whilſt the Romans were buſied in helping their Conſul; an unexpected Storm came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themſelves. Hannibal had appointed his Numedian Light Horſe, to give upon the Romans in Flank, and to compaſs them about, whilſt he with his men at Arms ſuſtained their Charge, and met them in the Face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the ſcattered Foot, that ran away at the firſt encounter; and then falling on the backs of thoſe whoſe looks were faſtned upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impreſſion the Romans were ſhuffled together, and routed, ſo that they all betook them to their ſpeed, and left unto their Enemies the Honour of the day.

When Scipio ſaw his Horſe thus beaten, and the reſt of his Army thereby greatly diſcouraged; he thought it a point of wiſdom, having loſt ſo many of his Fleet upon the firſt puff of wind, to take Port with the reſt, before the extremeſt of the Tempeſt over-took him. For he ſaw by the lowring morning, what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his Battail of Foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner ſtole the retreat, and recovered the Bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithſtanding all the haſte that he made, he left ſix hundred of his Rear behind him, who were the laſt that ſhould have paſſed, and ſtaid to break the Bridge. Herein he followed this Rule of a good Man of War, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitam mile. arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which muſt be underſtood in this ſort: If a General of an Army, by ſome unproſperous beginnings, doubt the ſucceſs, or find his Army fearful or wavering, it is more profitable to ſteal a ſafe Retreat, than to abide the uncertain event of Battel.

It was two days after, ere Hannibal could paſs the River; Scipio the whilſt refreſhing his men, and eaſing himſelf of his Wound in Placentia. But as ſoon as Hannibal preſented his Army before the Town, offering Battel to the Romans, who durſt not accept it, nor iſſue forth of their Camp; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear courage to forſake him. They thought that now the long-deſired time was come, in which better Chieftains and Souldiers than Aneroeſtus, Britomarus, and the Geſſates, were come to help them: if they had the hearts to help themſelves. Wherefore the ſame night they fell upon the Roman Camp; wounded and ſlew many; eſpecially of thoſe Guards that kept Watch at the Gate; with whoſe Heads in their Hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and preſented their Service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteouſly, and diſmiſt them to their own places, as men likely to be of more uſe to him, in perſwading the reſt of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other ſervice at the preſent.

About the fourth Watch of the Night following, the Conſul ſtole a Retreat, as he had done before, but not with the like eaſe and ſecurity. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, ſent the Numidians after him: following himſelf with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of Spoil, had not ſtaid to ranſack their Camp, and thereby given time to all, ſave ſome few in Rear, that were ſlain or taken, to paſs the River of Trebia, and ſave themſelves. Scipio, being both unable to travel by reaſon of his Wound, and withal finding it expedient to attend the coming of his Fellow-Conſul, incamps himſelf ſtrongly upon the Banks of Trebia. Neceſſity required that he ſhould ſo do; yet this diminiſhed his Reputation. For every day more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian ſide; among whom came in the Boij, that brought with them the Roman Commiſſioners, which they had taken in the late Inſurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeem their own Hoſtages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as Tokens and Pledges of their Affections towards him; by whoſe help they conceived better hope of recovering their own Men and Lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great ſcarcity of Victuals, attempted the taking of Claſtidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their Store and Munition. But there need no Force; a Brunduſian, whom the Romans had truſted with keeping it, ſold it for a little Money.

The news of theſe diſaſters brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a deſire of haſty revenge, than any great ſorrow for their loſs received; ſeeing that in a manner, all their Foot, wherein their Strength and Hope conſiſted, were as yet entire. They therefore haſted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him ſent out of Sicil, awaited his coming. He therefore haſted thither, and from thence he marched ſpeedily towards his Colleague, who attended him upon the Banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Conſuls deviſed about that which remained to be done. Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had paſſed ſince Hannibals arrival; the fortune of the late Fight, and by what error or miſadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the Revolt and Treaſon of the Gaules.

Sempronius having received from Scipio the ſtate of the Affairs in thoſe parts; ſought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his Wounds, that thereby he might purchaſe to himſelf the ſole Glory of the Victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He alſo feared the Election of the new Conſuls, his own time being well near expired. But Scipio perſwaded the contrary, objecting the unskilfulneſs of the new-come Souldiers, and withal, gave him good reaſon to aſſure him, that the Gaules, naturally unconſtant, were upon terms of abandoning the Party of the Carthaginians; thoſe of them inhabiting between the Rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haſte to find out the Diſhonour, which he might otherwiſe eaſily have avoided. This reſolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleaſing to Hannibal, who feared nothing ſo much as delay and loſs of time. For the ſtrength of his Army, conſiſting in Strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no leſs feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own Home, had many paſſions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the deſire of Sempronius, it fell out ſo, that about the ſame time, the Gaules inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of Injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not ſupply Hannibal with Neceſſaries, as he ſuppoſed that they might have done, although he daily reprehended their negli-negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to let them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver, and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fly to the Romans for help: and to make their Tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyn with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their Falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the Honour of Rome to preserve the Confederates from suffering injury: and that hereby might be won the Friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out a thousand Horse, which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal his Forragers, and finding them heavy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own Camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians sally out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the Enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Army was drawn forth, and a Battel ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This Victory (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in general desirous to try the main chance in open Field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gaules, his Spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the Victory, by adding some stratagem to his Forces. He found in the hollow of a Watercourse, over-grown with high Reed, a fit Trench to cover an Ambush. Thereinto he casts his Brother Mago, with a thousand choice Horse, and as many Foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their Camp, he led into the Field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent over Trebia some Companies of Numidian light Horse, to brave the Enemy, and draw him forth to a bad Dinner, ere he had broke his Fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight, and therefore not only issued out of his Camp, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his Foot being wet almost to the Arm-holes, which, together with the want of Food, did so enfeeble and cool their Courages, as they wanted force to handle the Arms they bare. Strong they were in Foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latines, having of the one, sixteen, of the other, twenty thousand. The mass of these they ranged in a gross Battalion, guarded on the Flanks with three thousand Horse: thrusting their Light-armed and Darters in loose Troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of Foot, were in a manner equal to their Enemies; in Horse, they had by far the better, both in number and goodness. When therefore the Roman Horse, ranged on the Flanks of their Foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their Foot were charged both in Front and Flank, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush, then fell the Romans by heaps under the Enemies Swords, and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the Horse-men that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompenced with the loss that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champain, being by far inferior in Horse, and withal thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or uneven Grounds, and Wood-lands, would have been of no use. His second error was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought, whereby he was grossly over-reacht and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his Foot-men with empty Stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby in effect they lost the use of their Limbs. For as one saith well: There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to present an Army tyred with travel, to an Enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of mind is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians; who either perceived him not, because of the Showers, or would not perceive him, because they were overwearied. Sempronius escaped with extream danger, flying through the Country that was overrun by the Enemies Horse. He was attended by more than were requisite in a secret Flight; yet by fewer than could have made resistance, if the Enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his Office in chooSing new Consuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The Departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain; and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharp, and unfit for service, to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keep the Field, lay warm in Placentia and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet, but vexed them with continual alarms; assailing divers places, taking some, beating the Gaules their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his Party, who presented him, in token of their faithful Love, with two Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in general all such Prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with Irons, and miserably fed: those of their Followers, he not only well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without Ransome; with this Protestation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the Oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his Party and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in fear, lest he should make their Country the Seat of the War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their Territory. Where some of them conspired against his Life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practise against him; him; but were in like ſort detected. He was therefore glad to uſe Peruques of Hair, and falſe Beards of divers colours, to the end that he might not be deſcribed, nor known to thoſe that ſhould undertake to make him away. Fain he would have paſſed the Apennines, upon the firſt appearance of Spring, but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had ſeen more Swallows than one. At length, when the year was ſomewhat better opened, he reſolved to take his leave of theſe giddy Companions, and bring the War nearer to the Gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Army greatly increaſed with Ligurians and Gauls, more ſerviceable Friends abroad, than in their own Countrey. That the paſſage of the Apennine Mountains was troubleſome, I hold it needleſs to make any doubt. Yet ſince the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and over them, ought in reaſon to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all ways foul, than to any intollerable difficulty in that Journey. Nevertheleſs, to avoid the length of way, together with the reſiſtance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary paſſages towards Rome: he choſe at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travel through the Fens and rotten grounds of Tuſcane. In thoſe Mariſhes and Bogs, he loſt all his Elephants, ſave one, together with the uſe of one of his Eyes, by the moiſtneſs of the Air, and by lodging on the cold Ground, and wading through deep Mire and Water. In brief, after he had with much ado recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium, where he ſomewhat refreſhed his wearied Followers, and heard news of the Roman Conſuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been choſen Conſuls for this year: Servilius, a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed Popular Orator, who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Conſulſhip, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be ſerved ſo again, unleſs he quickly finiſhed the War. This jealous Conſul thought it not beſt for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, leſt his Adverſaries, by faining ſome religious impediments, ſhould detain him within the City, or find other buſineſs for him at home, to diſappoint him of the Honour that he hoped to get in the War. Wherefore he departed ſecretly out of the Town, and meant to take poſſeſſion of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (ſo the Senators were called) highly diſpleaſed with this, revoked him by Embaſſadors: but he neglected their injunction; and haſting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he ſhortly found them.

The fiery diſpoſition of this Conſul, promiſed unto Hannibal great aſſurance of Victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the reſt of the Army. All the Countrey between Feſulæ and Arretium, he put to Fire and Sword, even under the Conſuls Noſe, which was enough to make him ſtir, that would not have ſitten ſtill, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true, that a great Captain of France hath ſaid; Pays gaſte veſte pas perdu; A waſted Country is not thereby loſt. But by this waſte of the Country, Flaminius thought his own Honour to be much impaired, and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many adviſed him (which had indeed been beſt) to have patience a while, and ſtay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear; ſaying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilſt the Carthaginians went burning down all Italy before them, to the Gates of Rome. Therefore he took Horſe, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enſigns ſtuck ſo faſt in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Enſign-bearer. Of this Tale, whether true or falſe, Tully makes a Jeſt; ſaying, that the cowardly Knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the Earth. Neither was the anſwer of Flaminius (if it were true) diſagreeable hereto. For he commanded that it ſhould be digged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withal, whether Letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this Jealouſie, both he, and the Senate that gave him cauſe, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Cortona, as far as to the Lake of Thraſymene, was on a light Fire, which whilſt the Conſul thought to quench with his Enemies Blood, he purſued Hannibal ſo unadviſedly, that he fell, with his whole Army, into an ambuſh cunningly laid for him, between the Mountains of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all ſides (ſave only where that great Lake of Peruſia permitted neither his Enemies to come at him, nor him to fly from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make reſiſtance. So was he ſlain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thouſand dead Carkaſſes of his Countrey-men. About ſix thouſand of his men, that had the Vant-guard, took courage, as for the moſt part happens, out of deſperation, and breaking through the Enemies that ſtood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If theſe had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which kindled by neceſſity, had wrought the effects of hardineſs; was well aſſwaged, when they ceaſed to deſpair of ſaving their Lives by flight. They ſtood ſtill in a cold Sweat upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noiſe, but not diſcovering how things went, becauſe of the great Fog that held all the Morning. When it grew toward Noon, the Air was cleared, and they might plainly diſcern the lamentable Slaughter of their Fellows. But they ſtaid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were deſcried, and attached by the Enemies Horſe. This they ſhould have thought upon ſooner, ſince they had no mind to return unto the Fight. For deſcried they were, and Maharbal ſent after them; who overtook them by night in a Village, which he ſurrounded with his Horſe: and ſo they yielded the next day, rendring their Arms upon his promiſe of their Lives and Liberties. This accord Hannibal refuſed to confirm; ſaying, that it was made by Maharbal, without ſufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own Honour) what it was to keep no Faith: and fitted them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawful unto the Romans, to alter Covenants, or add unto them what they liſted; if the Carthaginians muſt be fain to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of Talents, beſides their firſt Bargain; as alſo to renounce their Intereſt in Sardinia, and be limitted in their Spaniſh Con-

Conqueſts, according to the good pleaſure of the Romans, whoſe preſent advantage is more ample, than the Conditions of the late concluded Peace: then can Hannibal be as Roman as themſelves; and make them know, that perfidiouſneſs gaineth no more in proſperity, than it loſeth in the change of Fortune. Fifteen thouſand Italian Priſoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he ſet free without Ranſom, proteſting, as he had done before, that it was for their ſakes, and to free them and others from the Roman Tyranny, that he had undertaken this War. But the Romans he kept in ſtreight Priſon, and in Fetters, making them learn to eat hard Meat. This was a good way to bread in the People of Italy, if not a Love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this War had not concerned the general Safety, but only the preſerving of her own Neck from the Yoke of Slavery, which her over-ſtrong Enemies would thruſt upon her, in revenge of her Oppreſſions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by ſucceſs of many Ages, is not loſt in one or two Battels. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partiſans.

Preſently after the Battel of Thraſymene, C. Centronius, with four thouſand Roman Horſe, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was ſent from Ariminum, by Servilius the other Conſul, to increaſe the ſtrength of Flaminius; but coming too late, he increaſed only the Miſadventure. Mabarbal was imployed by Hannibal, to intercept this Company, who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great Overthrow, charged them, and brake them, and killing almoſt half of them, drave the reſt unto an high piece of Ground, whence they came down, and ſimply yielded to Mercy the next day. Servilius himſelf was in the mean while skirmiſhing with the Gauls; againſt whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the News were brought him of his Colleagues Overthrow and Death in Hetruria, that made him haſten back to the defence of Rome.

In theſe Paſſages it is eaſie to diſcern the fruits of popular jealouſie, which perſwaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the Wars, which greatly indangered and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is, that all men are far better taught by their own Errours, than by the examples of their Fore-goers. Flaminius had heard in what a Trap Sempronius had been taken but the year before, by this ſubtil Carthaginian, yet ſuffered he himſelf to be caught ſoon after in the ſame manner. He had alſo belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Conſul, and ambitious of the ſole Honour of beating Hannibal in Battel, without help of his Companion Scipio, had been rewarded with ſhame and loſs, elſe would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been ſo haſty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his Charge, it is probable that he would have taken his Companion with him the ſecond time, and have ſearched all ſuſpected places, proper to have ſhadowed an ambuſh: both which, this new Conſul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten years, Cæſar brought that mighty Nation together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman Yoke, into which parts had been there very year a new Lieutenant ſent, they would hardly, if ever, have been ſubdued. For it is more than the beſt Wit in the World can do, to inform it ſelf, within one years compaſs, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to proſecute a War to the beſt effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence, by reaſon of the ſhortneſs of that their time, many of them have returned as wiſe as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they began but to know the firſt rudiments of War, and Government, fitting the Countrey, they have been called home, and new Apprentices ſent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Eſtate. But it hath ever been the courſe of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them, and of Princes and Governours to uphold their ſlothful ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other Ages and People, though neither likeneſs of time, of occaſion, or of any other circumſtance, have perſwaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, ſought to conſume the Force of Hannibal, by lingring War. Minutius, the Maſter of the Horſe, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and ſucceſsful attempting, adventures raſhly upon Hannibal; and is like to periſh with his Army, but reſcued by Fabius.

GReatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill ſucceſs, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than ever did War, ſince Rome it ſelf was taken. They were good Souldiers, and ſo little accuſtomed to receive an Overthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open Field, all Italy was ſtrangely affected with his ſucceſs, and held him in admiration, as one that could work Wonders. But Pyrrhus his Quarrel was not grounded upon hate: he only ſought Honour, and fought (as it were) upon a bravery: demeaning himſelf like a courteous Enemy. This Carthaginian deteſted the whole Roman Name; againſt which he burned with deſire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thraſymene witneſſed his purpoſe, and his ability. Which to withſtand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of uſe, and created a Dictator. The Dictators Power was greater than the Conſuls, and ſcarcely ſubject unto comptrole of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was ſeldom choſen, but upon ſome extremity, and for no longer time than ſix months. He was to be named by one of the Conſuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were ſo, that the Conſul (if he ſtood upon his Prerogative) might name whom he pleaſed. At this time, the one Conſul being dead, and the other too far off; the People took upon them, as having ſupream Authority, to give the Dignity by their Election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the beſt reputed man of War in the City. Novum factum, novum conſilium expetit; Contrary Winds, contrary Courſes. Q. Fabius choſe M. Minutius Rufus Maſter of the Horſe: which Officer was cuſtomarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The firſt act of Fabius, was the reformation of ſomewhat amiſs in matter of Religion: a good beginning, and commendable, had the Religion been alſo good. But if it were true (as Livy reports it) that the Books of Sybil were conſulted, and gave direction in this buſineſs of Devotion; then muſt we believe, that thoſe books of Sybil, preſerved in Rome, were dictated by an evil ſpirit. For it was ordained, that ſome Vow, made in the beginning of this War to Mars, ſhould be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: alſo that great Plays ſhould be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other ſuch trumpery. This vehemency of ſuperſtition, proceeds always from vehemency of fear. And ſurely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly diſtempered with paſſion: whereof that memorable accident, of two Women that ſuddenly died, when they ſaw their Sons return alive from Thraſymene, may ſerve to bear witneſs; though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The Walls and Towers of the City, were now repaired and fortified; the Bridges upon Rivers were broken down; and all care taken for defence of Rome it ſelf. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly ſet forth againſt Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian Fleet had intercepted all the ſupply that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Againſt theſe Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Conſul to put to Sea; and taking up all the Ships about Rome and Oſtia, to purſue them: whilſt he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levied in haſte: and from Ariminum he received the Army, which Servilius the Conſul had conducted thither.

With theſe forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian Horſe had over the Romans, he always lodged himſelf on high grounds, and of hard acceſs. Hannibal in the mean while, purſuing his Victory, had ranged over all the Countrey, and uſed all manner of cruelty towards the Inhabitants; eſpecially to thoſe of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the Sword all that were able to bear Arms. Paſſing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick ſhores; refreſhed his diſeaſed and over-travelled Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his diſpatches for Carthage, preſenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the Spoils he had gotten. Having refreſhed his Army, fed his Horſes, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his Horſe Heels of the ſcratches, by waſhing their paſterns in old Wine: he followed the Coaſt of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northern Province of the Kingdom of Naples; ſpoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City; only he had aſſayed Spoletum, a Colony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, preſently gave it over.

The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it ſpent, in a great Siege. This the Proteſtant Army found true at Poictiers, a little before the Battel of Moncounter; and their victorious Enemies, anon after, at St. Jean d' Angeley. But Hannibal was more wiſe. He would not engage himſelf in any ſuch Enterpriſe, as ſhould detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in Force and Reputation; knowing, that when once he was abſolute Maſter of the Field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their Gates, without expecting any Engine of Battery. To this end he preſented Fabius with Battel, as ſoon as he ſaw him; and provoked him with all manner of Bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences between Souldiers bred up, ever ſince they were Boys, in War and in Blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many Victories there; and of late by ſome notable acts againſt the Romans; and ſuch as had no oftner ſeen the Enemy, than been vanquiſhed by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian ſo near, as he kept him from ſtragling too far; and preſerved the Countrey from utter ſpoil. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and he brought them firſt to look on the Lion a far off, that in the end they might ſit on his tail.

Now Minutius had a contrary diſpoſition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardiſe and fear. But all ſtirred not this well-adviſed Commander. For wiſe men are no more moved with ſuch Noiſe, than with Wind bruſſed out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiſcretion and danger, than to purſue misfortune: It waſteth it ſelf ſooner by ſufferance, than by oppoſition. It is the invading Army that deſires battel: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the victorious. Fabius therefore ſuffered Hannibal to croſs the Apennines, and to fall upon the moſt rich and pleaſant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any Arguments be perſwaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battel: but being far too weak in Horſe, he always kept the Hills and faſt grounds. When Hannibal ſaw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight; that the Winter came on; and that the Towns ſtood firm for the Romans, whoſe Legions were in ſight, though a-far off; he reſolved to reſt his Army, that was loaden with Spoil, in ſome plentiful and aſſured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he muſt paſs along by the Dictators Camp, that hung over his Head upon the Hills of Callicula and Caſilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might iſſue out of that goodly Garden-Countrey, which he had already waſted, into places more aboundant of proviſion for his wintering. It was by meer Error of his Guide, that he firſt entred within theſe ſtreights. For he would have been directed unto Caſſinum, whence he might both aſſay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promiſes under Hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide miſunderſtood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry an other way, from Caſſinum to Caſilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he ſhould not eaſily eſcape. Now began the Wiſdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a Trap, and won the Victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himſelf, by a ſlight invention, yet ſerving the turn as well as a better. In driving the Countrey, he had gotten about two thouſand Kine; whoſe Horns he dreſſed with dry faggots, and ſetting fire to them in the dark Night, cauſed them to be driven up the Hills. The Spectacle was ſtrange, and therefore terrible; eſpecially to thoſe that knew it to be the work of a terrible Enemy. What it ſhould mean, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a device to circumvent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the Hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when ſome of theſe fiery Monſters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore haſtily away, thinking that the Enemies were behind their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leſs afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army, recovered ſure ground, without moleſtation: where he ſtayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light foot-foot-men, with ſome ſlaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in Skirmiſh. After this, Hannibal made ſemblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coaſted him in the wonted manner, keeping ſtill on high grounds, between him and the City, whilſt the Carthaginian waſted all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forſaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-Houſes for Winter, and incamped under the broken Walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time paſſed idlely, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about ſome buſineſs of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius, the Maſter of the Horſe.

Minutius was glad of this good occaſion to ſhew his own ſufficiency. He was fully perſwaded, that his Romans, in plain Field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by ſubtilty and ambuſh, which he thought himſelf wiſe enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that ſo earneſtly, as he was preferred by judgment of the Souldiers, in Worthineſs to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden ſo to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whoſe command was extreme peril of death. But the Honour of the Victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at Home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to ſave him from the Dictators Rods and Axes, took he the matter never ſo heinouſly. Hannibal on the other ſide was no leſs glad, that he ſhould play with a more adventurous gameſter. Therefore he drew near: and to provoke the Romans, ſent forth a third part of his Army to waſte the Countrey. This was boldly done, ſeeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it ſeems, that he now deſpiſed thoſe whom he had ſo often vanquiſhed. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which becauſe it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians ſeiſed upon by Night, with two thouſand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plain force, wan it from them the next day; and entrenching himſelf thereupon, became their nearer Neighbour.

The main buſineſs of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his Men, but for his Horſes, which he knew to be the chief of his ſtrength; that he might keep them in good Heart againſt the next Summer: if beſides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increaſe his Reputation, encourage his own men, terrifie his Enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Countrey at Will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many days iſſue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian ſent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in Harveſt. This advantage Minutius wiſely eſpied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and ſetting it in order, preſented battel to Hannibal, that was not in caſe to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His Horſe, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he ſent abroad againſt the forragers; who being diſperſed over all the Fields, and loaden with booty, could make no reſiſtance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worſe did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to aſſail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer Weakneſs which held him within his Camp; and therefore were bold to deſpiſe his great Name, that could not reſiſt their preſent ſtrength. But in the heat of the buſineſs, Aſdrubal came from Geryon with four thouſand men, being informed of the danger, by thoſe that had eſcaped the Roman Horſe. This emboldened Hannibal to iſſue forth againſt the Romans; to whom nevertheleſs he did not ſuch hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of ſervice Minutius was highly eſteemed by the Army, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he ſent the News, with ſomewhat greater boaſt than truth. It ſeemed no ſmall matter, that the Roman Army had recovered ſpirit, ſo far forth that it dared to ſet upon Hannibal in his own Camp; and that in ſo doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praiſed the Maſter of the Horſe, that had wrought this great alteration; and conſequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wiſely in all his Dictatorſhip; ſaving that he choſe ſuch a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had ſo greatly erred. But the Dictator was not ſo joyful of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of Diſcipline, and fearful of greater danger, thereon likely to enſue. He ſaid that he knew his own place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Maſter of the Horſe to do ſo likewiſe; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: ſpeaking it openly, That good ſucceſs, iſſuing from bad counſel, was more to be feared than calamity; for as much as the one bred a fooliſh confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Againſt theſe Sermons every one cried out; eſpecially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to ſpeak, and do what he liſt, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (ſaid he) that this our only Man, choſen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greateſt neceſſity, hath done no manner of good, but ſuffered all Italy to be waſted before his Eyes, to the utter ſhame of our State; unleſs he alſo hinder others from doing better than himſelf can, or dares? It were good to conſider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not choſen any new Conſul all this while; Servilius is ſent away to Sea. I know not why; Hannibal and He, have, as it were, taken Truce; Hannibal ſparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborn to ſpoil ſome grounds of Fabius, that ſo he might bring him into envy and ſuſpicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to ſpoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: He would have the War to laſt long, that he himſelf might be long in Office, and have the ſole Government both of our City and Armies. But this muſt not be ſo. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this Authority, ſhould again take it from him, and confer it upon one more worthy. But leſt, in moving the people hereto, I ſhould ſeem to do him injury; thus far forth I will regard his Honour: I will only propound, That the Maſter of the Horſe may be joyned in equal Authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor leſs neceſſary, than was the electing of this Dictator by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perſwaded of the courſe which Fabius had taken againſt Hannibal, as being neither plauſible, nor ſeeming beneficial at the preſent; yet was there none ſo injurious, as to think that his general intent, and care of the Weal publick, was leſs than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in paſſing of any Act, that ſome man of Credit and Authority, beſides the Propounder, ſhould ſtand up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principal Citizens was found ſo impudent, as to offer that open diſgrace, both unto a worthy Perſonage, and (therewithal) unto that Dignity, whoſe great power had freed the State at ſeveral times, from the greateſt dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prætor, was glad of ſuch an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the ſon of a Butcher; afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious ſpirit, grew, by often brablings, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens Cauſes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and roſe by degrees, being advanced by thoſe, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baſeneſs. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give an hard puſh at the Conſulſhip; by doing that which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durſt or would. So he made an hot invective, not only againſt Fabius, but againſt all the Nobility; ſaying, that it grieved them to ſee the people do well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; that they ſought to humble the Commons by Poverty, and to impoveriſh them by War; eſpecially by War at their own doors, which would ſoon conſume every poor mans living, and find him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bad them to be wiſe; and ſince they had found one (this worthy Maſter of the Horſe) that was better affected unto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deſerts; and give him Authority, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that ſo he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act paſſed.

Before this buſie day of contention, Fabius had diſpatched the Election of a new Conſul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius: and having finiſhed all requiſite buſineſs, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he ſhould not be able to withſtand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The News of Minutius his advancement, was at the Camp as ſoon as Fabius: ſo that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the firſt, in what ſort he thought it beſt to divide their Authority: whether that one, one day; and the other the next; or each of them, ſucceſſively, for ſome longer time, ſhould command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleaſure of the Citizens, to make the Maſter of the Horſe equal to the Dictator; but that he ſhould never be his Superiour: He would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the cuſtom. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleaſed; for that with half of the Army he could not work ſuch Wonders, as otherwiſe he hoped to accompliſh. Nevertheleſs he meant to do his beſt; and ſo taking his part of the Army, incamped about a mile and an half from the Dictator. Needful it was (though Livy ſeem to tax him for it) that he ſhould ſo do. For where two ſeveral Commanders are not ſubordinate one unto the other, nor joyned in Commiſſion, but have each entire and abſolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging unto one Prince or State) not one, but two diſtinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp ſhall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polybius neither finds fault with this disjunction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief ſucceſſively (as the two Conſuls uſed) with Minutius, by turns. He ſaith, that Minutius was very refractory; and ſo proud of his advancement, that continually he oppoſed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the Forces between them, as is ſaid before, or elſe to have command over all by courſe. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of ſubjection, when once they have broken looſe from the rigour of Authority, love nothing more than to conteſt with it: as if herein conſiſted the proof and aſſurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Maſter of the Horſe, to make good the Opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no leſs careful, of getting occaſion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the neceſſity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally deſired, could not long be wanting. The Countrey lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for Ambuſh as could be wiſhed: for that the ſides of a naked Valley adjoyning, had many, and ſpacious Caves; able, ſome one of them to hide Two or Three Hundred men. In theſe lurking places, Hannibal beſtowed Five Hundred Horſe, and Five Thouſand Foot; thruſting them ſo cloſe together, that they could not be diſcovered. But leſt by any miſadventure they ſhould be found out, and buried in their Holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to ſeize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needful care, to buſineſs little concerning them. Like unto this was the occaſion, which, not long before, had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increaſe his Honour, in like ſort as he got it; he ſent firſt his light Armature, then his Horſe, and at length (ſeeing that Hannibal ſeconded his own Troops with freſh Companies) he followed in perſon with the Legions. He was ſoon caught; and ſo hotly charged on all ſides, that he knew neither how to make reſiſtance, nor any ſafe Retreat. In this dangerous caſe, whilſt the Romans defended themſelves, loſing many, and thoſe of their beſt men: Fabius drew near, in very good order, to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving a far off, into what extremity his new Colleague had raſhly thrown himſelf, and his followers, did the Office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the diſgrace which he had wrongfully ſuſtained, ſought rather to approve himſelf, by haſting to do good, than by ſuffering his Enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired; fearing to be well wetted with a ſhower, from the Cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung ſo long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith ſubmitted himſelf to Fabius; by whoſe benefit he confeſſed his life to have been ſaved. So from this time forwards, the War proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilſt his Office laſted, which was not long, and likewiſe afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Conſuls, that followed his inſtructions.

Servilius the Conſul had purſued in vain a Carthaginian Fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the Coaſt of Italy; took Hoſtages of the Sardinians and Corſicans; paſſed over into Africk; and there negligently falling to ſpoil the Countrey, was ſhamefully beaten aboard his Ships, with the loſs of a thouſand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haſte, he returned home by Sicil; and (being ſo required by the Dictator's Letters) repaired to the Camp, with his fellow-Conſul, where they took charge of the Army.

§. VII.

The Roman People, desirous to finish the War quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great Forces levied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans Provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

WITH little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, hear the great commendations, that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great Overthrow: but he had neither finished the War, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem, that the Reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole Winter, contrary to all former custom; since it was never heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his Command to run away without any performance; as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man, to discharge the grief and anger of his own private loss, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This Affection of the People, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike whilst the Iron was hot; his own Worth being little or none, and his Credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commonalty were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a Kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he lifted, without all regard of truth or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, That Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius, with the other two; but had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the Victory of Minutius, when he commanded over all, as Master of the Horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the War would never be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians as had long since been advanced to Honour by the People, were grown as proud as the old Nobility, and contemned the meaner sort, ever since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needful to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meer new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well deserving of them. By such perswasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other Vertue, than his detracting from their Honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he again deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum took Name and Being in Rome, at the Death of Romulus; and was in use at the Death of other Kings. The order of it was this: All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an Hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and governed successively, by the space of five days, one Decury after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of Rods and Axes, waited only upon the chief of them with these Ensigns of Power. This custom was retained in times of the Consuls, and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to let slip five days, and then was all to begin a-new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well asswaged. Upon such change of those that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawful unto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publickly declare themselves to seek those Offices. But no device would serve against the general favour born unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed over; and the malice of the Fathers, against the Vertue (as it was believed) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had urged the business to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the Election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who few years since had overcome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdom, was urged by the Nobility to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himself any more in such great business of the Commonwealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, He, and M. Livius, that had been his Companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called unto judgment: wherein Livius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in mind, each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grievous loss; the other bravely winning, in the most happy Victory, that ever befel that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence, in preparing for the War: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what Wonders he would work, and that he would ask no more than once to have a fight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the providence and care of Paulus, travelled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls, Servilius and Atilius; desiring them to abstain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague ſhould take the Field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might find the four old Legions well accuſtomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was alſo very ſtrict in his Muſters; wherein the whole Senate aſſiſted him ſo carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the ſlanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raiſed it is uncertain. Fourſcore thouſand Foot, at the leaſt, and ſix thouſand Horſe, they were ſtrong in the Field, when the day came, which Varro had ſo greatly deſired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuſe, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were diſtreſſed by their own Mercinaries; ſo did he now ſend help to Rome, a thouſand Archers and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barley, and other Proviſions: fearing nothing more, than that one of theſe two mighty Cities ſhould deſtroy the other, whereby his own Eſtate would fall to ruine; that ſtood upright, by having them ſomewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them alſo counſel, to ſend Forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the War from Home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and inſtructions were given to Titus Octacilius the Prætor, which was to go into Sicil, that he ſhould accordingly paſs over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies which the Romans made at this time, do much more ſerve to declare their puiſſance, than any, though larger, account by Poll, of ſuch as were not eaſily drawn into the Field, and fitted for ſervice. For beſides theſe Armies of the Conſuls, and that which went into Sicil; twenty five thouſand, with L. Poſthumius Albinus, another of the Prætors, went againſt the Gaules, to reclaim that Province, which the paſſage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their preſent ſtrength, might well embolden them to do as they did. They ſent Embaſſadors to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliver into their hands, Demetrius Pharius: who having been their Subject, and Rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They alſo ſent to the Illyrians, to demand their Tribute; whereof the day of payment was already paſt. What Anſwer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not ſent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money; by the ſhifts that they were driven ſoon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little ſoever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non payment of the whole.

Whilſt the City was buſied in theſe cares, the old Conſuls lay as near unto Hannibal as poſſibly they could, without incurring the neceſſity of a Battel. Many Skirmiſhes they had with him; wherein their ſucceſs, for the moſt part, was rather good than great. Yet one miſchance not only blemiſhed the Honour of their other Services, but was indeed the occaſion, to draw on the miſery following. Hannibal, for the moſt part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his ſtore for the Winter. The Romans, to be near him, lodged about Cannuſium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aſide for all Neceſſaries, to the loſs of good Opportunities, they beſtowed much of their Proviſions in the Caſtle of Cannæ: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan; and thereby not only furniſhed himſelf, but compelled his Enemies to want many needful things, unleſs they would be troubled with far carriage. Beſides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himſelf to abide in that open Countrey, fit for the ſervice of his Horſe: longer than the Romans, having ſo many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering Battel; which he moſt deſired. Of this miſhap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them underſtand, how this Piece, taken by Hannibal, would ſerve him to command no ſmall part of the Countrey adjacent; it then ſeemed needful, even unto the Fathers themſelves, to adventure a Battel with the Carthaginian, rather than ſuffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheleſs anſwer was returned unto Servilius, that he ſhould have patience yet a while: for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a power ſufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the ſeaſon of the year commodious to take the Field; the two Conſuls, with their Army, ſet forth againſt Hannibal. This was always done with great Solemnity: eſpecially, whenſoever they went forth to War againſt any noble or re-doubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and ſolemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the reſt of their Gods, for good Succeſs and Victory: which being performed, the Generals, in warlike Attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, not only ſuch as were of their Kindred and Alliance, or followed them to the War, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, and diſmiſſed with friendly leave-taking, and good Wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Æmilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this Honour, or likely to do his Countrey remarkable Service. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a Troop no leſs in greatneſs, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to have exhorted the Conſul Paulus, with many grave words, to ſhew his Magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious folly of his fellow-Conſul. The anſwer of Paulus was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that he would do his beſt for his Countrey: but if he ſaw his beſt were likely to be ill taken, He would think it leſs raſhneſs to adventure upon the Enemies Sword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diſſenſion between the two Roman Conſuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans preſſed him to fight. The great Battel of Cannæ.

THeſe new Generals, arriving at the Camp, diſmiſſed M. Atilius, one of the laſt years Conſuls, requeſting it becauſe of his age and weakneſs: Servilius they retained with them, as their Aſſiſtant. The firſt thing that Æmilius thought neceſſary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad ſucceſs hitherto, hitherto, had gathered more cauſe of fear, than of courage. He willed them to conſider, not only now, their Victories in times paſt againſt the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no leſs than all that Rome at the preſent was able to ſet forth. He told them in what danger their Countrey ſtood; how the ſtate and ſafety thereof, reſted upon their hands; uſing ſome ſuch other common matter of perſwaſion. But the moſt effectual part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one Victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambuſh he had ſtollen the Honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thraſymene. Herewithal he taxed the inconſiderate raſhneſs of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one ſaw not his Enemies, until he was ſurrounded by them; the other ſcarce ſaw them, when they ſtruck off his Head, by reaſon of the thick miſt, through the darkneſs whereof he went groping (as it were blind-fold) into their ſnares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had againſt the Enemy; and how deſtitute the Enemy was of thoſe helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed againſt them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their beſt. They were eaſily perſwaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Arms, gave them cauſe to think, that under a Captain ſo well experienced, and every way ſufficient, as Æmilius was known to be, they ſhould eaſily prevail againſt the Carthaginians: that came far ſhort of them in all things elſe, ſave craft; which would not always thrive. But in one thing they miſtook the meaning of their General. It was his deſire, that they ſhould have heart to fight; not that they ſhould loſe the patience of waiting a convenient ſeaſon. But they, having pre-conceived a Victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby ſought to rob themſelves of their beſt help; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themſelves affected with the vulgar deſire, of ending the War quickly; wherein ſince Æmilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to uſe it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus alſo thought the Conſul Terentius; who was no leſs popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is always tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of moſt importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtful Paſſions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who haſtned their deſire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than ſhould his Colleague, though greater in the performance. Thus while the Romans think themſelves to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diſſention of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would ſo too, but ſaid that it was not yet time; why? becauſe the Enemy muſt ſhortly diſlodge, and remove hence, into Places leſs fit for his Horſe. But ſhall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his laſt years proviſions, return into Campania to gather a ſecond Harveſt? This would (ſaid Varro) ſavour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haſte (ſaid Paulus) doth ſavour no leſs of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Æmilius lodged ſix miles from Hannibal, where the ground was ſomewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to ſend them away in ſuch haſte, as they ſhould not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day deſcended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beſeeching him to ſtay. Nevertheleſs he ſate down cloſe by Hannibal: who as an unbidden Gueſt gave him but a rude welcom and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horſe, and light Armature, fell upon the Roman Vant-courrers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilſt it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loſs, for that the Romans had, among their Velites, ſome Troops weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handſomly withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Auſidus; ſending a third part of his Forces over the Water, to lye upon the Eaſtern Bank, where they entrenched themſelves. He never was more unwilling to fight, than at this preſent: becauſe the ground ſerved wholly for the advantage of his Enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occaſion ſhould draw him to more equal terms. Therefore he ſtirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himſelf; expecting when Hannibal ſhould diſlodge, and remove towards Geryon, Cannæ, or ſome other Place, where his ſtore lay, for want of Neceſſaries: whereof an Army forraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it ſufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be paſſed over with ſilence, That Livy differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many ſtrange Tales, of the miſery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of baſe courſes that he deviſed to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (ſaith Livy) but ten days proviſion of meat. He had not money to pay his Souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of ſeveral Nations, ſo that He knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, firſt, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very Famine. Eſpecially the Spaniards were ready to forſake him, and run over to the Roman ſide. Yea Hannibal himſelf was once upon the point, to have ſtollen away into Gaule with all his Horſe, and left his Foot unto their miſerable deſtinies. At length, for lack of all other counſel, He reſolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southermoſt Parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithful Souldiers might find the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harveſt. But whilſt he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans preſſed him ſo hard, that they even forced him unto that, which he moſt deſired; even to fight a Battel upon open champain ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livy, to ſpeak the beſt of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to ſay, That, without their own great folly, they had done paſſing well. Further alſo he may be excuſed; as writing only by report. For thus he ſaith; Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam [dicitur] agitâſſe; Hannibal [is ſaid] to have bethought himſelf of flying into Gaule: where he makes it no more than a matter of hear-ſay; as perhaps was all the reſt of this Relation. As for the proceſs it ſelf, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaule, through the Mariſhes and Bogs of Hetruria, could find Victuals enough, and all things needful unto his Army, the Summer foregoing: what ſhould hinder him to do the like this year; eſpecially ſeeing Liv. l. 22.

ing he had play'd the careful Husband in making a great Harveſt; ſince he had long been Maſter of the open Field; and beſides, had gotten, by ſurprize, no ſmall part of the Romans proviſions? Sutable hereunto is all the reſt. If Hannibal had taken nothing but Corn and Cattel; his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for Pay. But he brought Gold with him into Italy: and had ſo well increaſed his ſtock, ſince he came into that Countrey, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with ſpoyl: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not eaſie to do the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the general agreement of Hiſtorians: who give it as a principal commendation unto Hannibal, That he always kept his Army free from Sedition, though it were compoſed of ſundry Nations; no leſs different in Manners, Religion, and almoſt in Nature, than they were in Languages: and well might he ſo do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men ſoever fought bravely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but ſolemnly proteſted and ſworn, (beſides other rewards) to make as many of them, as ſhould deſerve and ſeek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a ſenſleſs device. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, took ſo little pleaſure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haſte to get him out of it. And what ſhould he now do there with his Horſe? or how could he be truſted, either there or elſewhere? yea, how could he deſire to live; having betrayed all his Army; and relinquiſhed his miſerable Foot, to the Butchery of their Enemies? This Tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the Life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his Directions from Livy. But of this and the like it is enough to ſay, That all Hiſtorians love to extol their own Countrey-men; and where a loſs cannot be diſſembled, nor the Honour of the Victory taken from the Enemy, and given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on ſome ſtrange miſ-government of their own Forces: as if they might eaſily have won all, but loſt all through ſuch folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the River Aufidus. Varro was perſwaded, that it concerned him in Honour, to make good his word unto the People of Rome: and ſince he had thus long waited in vain, to get the conſent of Paulus, now at length to uſe his own Authority; and, without any more diſputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the firſt break of day he began to paſs the River, without ſtaying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and ſought, as in former Times, to have diſſwaded him, from putting the eſtate of his Countrey to a needleſs hazard. Againſt whoſe words and ſubſtantial Arguments, Terentius could alledg none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had preſented them Battel at their Trenches: ſhould they endure this Bravado? He had ſent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the leſſer Camp; and drave them ſhamefully to run within their defences, which alſo they made offer to aſſail: muſt this alſo be ſuffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the ſpirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of ſuch courage, as promiſed aſſured Victory. When Æmilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obſtinate reſolution of his Companion; he took all care, that what he ſaw muſt be done, might be done well. Ten thouſand Roman Foot he cauſed to be left behind, in the greater Camp, oppoſite unto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled, to leave behind him ſome anſwerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was leſs able to ſpare from the Battel, than were the Romans) or that theſe ten thouſand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the Fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do ſuch accidents) terrifie and diſtract the Enemies in the heat of Fight. This done; the two Conſuls went over the water with their Army to the leſſer Camp, whence alſo they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of Battel: the ground on the Eaſt part of the River, ſeeming perhaps more fit for marſhalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cauſe; and, without any delay, paſſed likewiſe over, ſomewhat higher up the ſtream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own Camp ſo many, as he thought would ſerve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bad them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did ſo. And could you (ſaid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyn Battel with the Romans upon ſuch a level ground, where the ſtronger in Horſe are ſure to prevail? They all aſſented to him; and ſhewed by their Countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (ſaid he further) ye are firſt of all to thank the Gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into neceſſity of playing for their lives, where they are ſure to loſe them. As for theſe Romans, I was fain to encourage you againſt them, when ye met them firſt: but now ye may even encourage your ſelves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as ſeen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other reſpects; as, to drive them before you out of Gaule; and to win the open Countrey, and Fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themſelves, and all the Riches within them; which this Victory ſhall make yours. Therefore play the ſtout Souldiers: and ere many hours paſs, ye ſhall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had ſaid this; his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had ſent to view the Countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, What news; and what work they were likely to have with theſe Romans? Work enough (anſwered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee Brother, that among them all, ſearch them never ſo diligently, thou ſhalt not find one man, whoſe Name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and ſo did all that ſtood about him: which gladded the Souldiers, who thought their General would not be ſo merry, without great aſſurance. Whether it were ſo, that Hannibal, in the pride of his Victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thouſand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no leſs troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the ſad mood of his Brother with a jeſt, and ſhew himſelf merry unto the Souldiers: this his Anſwer was was more manly, than was the Relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himself had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the Battel of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fifth: saying, that of the French-men, there were enough to be killed; enough to be taken Prisoners; and enough to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant Jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when Battel is at hand, to work upon such passions, as must govern more of the business: especially, where other needful care is not wanting; without which they are but vain boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himself; expressing no less perfection of his military skill, than was greatness in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousness of the Place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his Enemies to Battel; He marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might do best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose Troops, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French Name Enfans perdues; but when we used our own terms, the Forlorn hope. The gross of his Army following them he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the Spoyls which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deep in File. Between these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their own Countrey manner; their Shields alike; but the Gaules using long broad Swords, that were forcible in a downright stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed Blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their Navel upwards, as confident in their own fierceness; the Spaniards, wearing white Cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of Body, and furious in giving charge; but soon wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were less eager, but more wary; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to return, and renew the Fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughness of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; so the Place which they held in this Battel, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose Name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present War. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the utmost of their hardiness, as knowing that the Enemy could not press far upon them, without further engaging himself than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in Horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the Place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should be over-hardly pressed. So, casting them into the form of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as serving only to guide it orderly back, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the Enemies, being well strengthned and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have been so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behind it: though such Figures, cut in brass, as I have seen of this Battel, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same Figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood between the last ranks of his long Batallions, and in the head of his Rear, doubtless well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battallion and the River Ausidus, were the Gaules and Spanish Horse, under the Command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Livy saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light Horse. Hannibal himself, with his Brother Mago, had the leading of the Rear. The whole sum of Hannibal's Army in the Field this day, was ten thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot; his Enemies having two to one against him in Foot; and He, five to three against them in Horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usual form: but somewhat more narrow, and deep, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had been found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former War. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rear, that it might stand fast compacted as a Wall, under shelter whereof the disordered Troops might re-ally themselves. Thus much it seems, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battels accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the Field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattelling was very unprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Æmilius; it was not his day of Command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yield for very weariness unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman Horse-men, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the Horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Servilius the former years Consul, had the leading of the Battel. The Sun was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light Skirmish between the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and Slingers of the Baleares: Asdrubal brake upon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of service on Horse-back, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like, but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the ſhoulder of the foot on the other hand, ſo that there was no way left, but to pierce and break through. Wherefore they not only uſed their Lances and Swords, but ruſhing violently amongſt the Enemies, graſped one another: and ſo their Horſes running from under them, fell many to the ground; where ſtarting up again, they began to deal Blows like Foot-men. In concluſion, the Roman Horſe were over-born, and driven by plain force to a ſtaggering recoil. This the Conſul Paulus could not remedy. For Aſdrubal, with his boiſtrous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be reſiſted by theſe Roman Gentlemen, unequal both in number, and in Horſemanſhip. When the Battels came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and ſomewhat more than enough to break that great Creſcent, upon which they firſt fell: ſo ſtrongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spaniſh Foot make reſiſtance. Wherefore the two points of their Battel drew towards the midſt; by whoſe aid, theſe Oppoſites were forced to disband, and fly back to their firſt place. This they did in great haſte and fear, and were with no leſs haſte and folly purſued. Upon the Africans that ſtood behind them, they needed not to fall foul, both for that there was void room enough, and foraſmuch as the Rear, or Horns of this Moon, pointed into the ſafe Retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time ſhould require. In this haſty Retreat, or Flight of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was neceſſary, that they who had ſtood in the Limb or utter Compaſs of the half Moon made the innermoſt or concave ſurface thereof (diſordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inſide outward, the Horns or points thereof, as yet untouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in purſuing them, were incloſed in an half Circle; which they ſhould not have needed greatly to regard (for that the ſides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and ſeeming unable to make reſiſtance) had all the Enemies foot been caſt into this one great Body, that was in a manner diſſolved. But whilſt the Legions, following their ſuppoſed Victory, ruſhed on upon thoſe that ſtood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themſelves deeply within the principal ſtrength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either ſide advanced ſo far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they incloſed them, in a manner, behind: and forward they could not paſs far, without removing Hannibal and Mago, which made that way the leaſt eaſie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Creſcent, before ſpoken of, was of ſuch extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undiſcerned, until now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares, and that they behaved themſelves as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been ſo mad, as to run headlong with the whole bulk of their Army, into the Throat of ſlaughter, had they ſeen thoſe Weapons bent againſt them at the firſt, which when they did ſee, they had little hope to eſcape. Much might be imputed to their heat of Fight, and raſhneſs of inferiour Captains: but ſince the Conſul Paulus, a man ſo expert in War, being vanquiſhed in Horſe, had put himſelf among the Legions; it cannot be ſuppoſed, that he and they did willfully thus ingage themſelves.

Plut. in vit. Hannib.

Aſdrubal having broken the Troops of Roman Horſe, that were led by the Conſul Paulus, followed upon them along the River ſide, beating down, and killing as many as he could (which were almoſt all of them) without regard of taking Priſoners. The Conſul himſelf was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did caſt himſelf among them, as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithſtanding the Defeat of his Horſe. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheleſs he cheared up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own ſtout behaviour: beating down, and killing many of the Enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the ſame part of the Battel; and with better ſucceſs. For the Conſul received a Blow from a Sling, that did him great hurt: and though a Troop of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their beſt to ſave him from further harm, yet was he ſo hardly laid at, that he was compelled by Wounds and Weakneſs, to forſake his Horſe. Hereupon all his Company alighted, thinking that the Conſul had given order ſo to do, as in many Battels, the Roman men at Arms had left their Horſes, to help their Foot in diſtreſs. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and underſtood that the Conſul had willed his Horſe-men to diſmount, He was very glad of it, and pleaſantly ſaid, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almoſt as ſafe as if they were ſo bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the Horſe of the Aſſociates, in the left Wing, was marvelouſly troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and down about that great ſandy Plain, raiſed a foul duſt, which a ſtrong South-wind, blowing there accuſtomarily, drave into the Eyes and Mouths of the Romans. Theſe uſing their advantage both of number and of lightneſs, wearied the Conſul and his Followers exceedingly, neither giving nor ſuſtaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the firſt they ſeemed to promiſe him an happy day of it. For when the Battels were even ready to joyn, five hundred of theſe Numidians came pricking away from their Fellows, with their Shields caſt behind their backs (as was the manner of thoſe which yielded) and throwing down their Arms, rendred themſelves. This was good luck to begin withal, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leiſure to examine them, but cauſed them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he had them reſt quietly till all was done. Theſe crafty adventurers did as he bad them for a while, till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpoſe for which they had thus yielded. Under their Jackets they had ſhort Swords and Ponyards, beſides which, they found other ſcattered Weapons about the Field, of ſuch as were ſlain, and therewithal flew upon the hindmoſt of the Romans, whilſt all eyes and thoughts were bent another way, ſo that they did great miſchief, and raiſed yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plain level ground, found means to lay an Ambuſh at the back of his Enemies. The laſt blow, that ended all fight and reſiſtance, was given by the ſame hand which gave the firſt. Aſdrubal having in ſhort ſpace broken the Roman Troops of Horſe, and cut in pieces all, ſave the Company of Æmilius that ruſhed into the groſs of his Foot, and a very few beſides, that recovered ſome narrow paſſage, between the River and their own Battalions; did not ſtay to charge charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians, with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius. This fearful cloud, as it ſhewed at the firſt appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other ſide: ſo did it prognoſticate a diſmal Storm unto thoſe, upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his Followers, having wearied themſelves much in doing little, and ſeeing more work toward than they could hope to ſuſtain; thought it the beſt way to avoid the danger by preſent flight. The Conſul was no leſs wiſe than they, in apprehending the greatneſs of his own peril; nor more deſperate, in ſtriving to work impoſſibilities: it being impoſſible, when ſo many ſhrank from him, to ſuſtain the impreſſion alone, which he could not have endured with their aſſiſtance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome, and another to incounter him. But of this, or of ought elſe, excepting haſty flight, his preſent leiſure would not ſerve him to conſider. Cloſe at the heels of him and his flying Troops, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Aſdrubal unto the purſuit, as fitteſt for that ſervice. Aſdrubal himſelf, with the Gauls and Spaniſh Horſe, compaſſing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans, that were, ere this, hardly diſtreſſed, and in a manner ſurrounded on all parts elſe. He brake them eaſily, who before made ill reſiſtance, being incloſed and laid at on every ſide, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitiful Slaughter: the vanquiſhed Multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whether, or which way, whilſt every one ſought to avoid thoſe Enemies, whom he ſaw neareſt. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got up to Horſe, and ſaved themſelves: which though it is hardly underſtood how they could do; yet I will rather believe it, than ſuppoſe that Livy ſo reporteth, to grace thereby his Hiſtory with this following Tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where he ſaw the Conſul ſitting all blooded upon a Stone, entreated him to riſe and ſave himſelf, offering him his aſſiſtance and Horſe. But Paulus refuſed it, willing Lentulus to ſhift for himſelf, and not to loſe time: ſaying, That it was not his purpoſe to be brought again into Judgment by the People, either as an Accuſer of his Colleague, or as guilty himſelf of that days loſs. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome as faſt and as well as they could; and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindful of his wholeſome counſel. Theſe words (peradventure) or ſome to like purpoſe, the Conſul uttered to Lentulus, either when againſt his will he was drawn to that Battel, or when he beheld the firſt Defeat of his Horſe, at what time he put himſelf in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he ſaid a good while before this; when he thought the Conſul and his Troop, in little better caſe than, if they had been bound. The whole Groſs of the Romans was incloſed indeed as within a Sack, whereof the African Battalions made the ſides, the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom, and Aſdrubal with his Horſe, cloſed up the Mouth: in which part, they firſt of all were ſhuffled together, and began the Rout, wherein all the reſt followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not ſit his Horſe, whilſt the Battel yet laſted, and whilſt the Spaces were ſomewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himſelf; was now (had he never ſo well been mounted) unable to fly, having in his way ſo cloſe a Throng of his own miſerable Followers, and ſo many heaps of Bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It ſufficeth unto his Honour, That in the Battel he fought no leſs valiantly, than he had warily before, both abſtained himſelf, and diſſwaded his Fellow Conſul from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly loſt, it had lain in his power to ſave his own Life, unto the good of his Country, never more needing it; I ſhould think, that he either too much diſeſteemed himſelf, or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankful Citizens. But if ſuch a reſolution were praiſe-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman Valour, then was the Engliſh Vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Vicount Liſle, Son to that famous Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battel of Chaſtillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grievouſly, if not mortally wounded, and accountable for the Overthrow received: Talbot was in the flower of his Youth, unhurt, eaſily able to have eſcaped, and not anſwerable for that days misfortune, when he refuſed to forſake his Father; who foreſeeing the loſs of the Battel, and not meaning to ſtain his actions paſt by flying in his old Age, exhorted this his noble Son to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible Overthrow died all the Roman Foot, ſave two or three thouſand, who (as Livy ſaith) eſcaped into the leſſer Camp, whence, the ſame night, about ſix hundred of them break forth, and joyning with ſuch of thoſe in the greater Camp, as were willing to try their Fortune, conveyed themſelves away ere morning, about four thouſand Foot, and two hundred Horſe, partly in whole Troops, partly diſperſed into Cannuſium: the next day, the Roman Camps, both leſs and greater, were yielded unto Hannibal by thoſe that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this Eſcape: only he reports, that the ten thouſand, whom Æmilius had left on the Weſt ſide of Auſidus (as was ſhewed before) to ſet upon the Camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed, but ere they could effect their deſire, which they had well-near done, the Battel was loſt, and Hannibal coming over the Water to them, drave them into their own Camp, which they quickly yielded, having loſt two thouſand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the firſt ſight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a great number of theſe did fly, and thereby eſcaped, whilſt their Fellows, making defence in vain, retired into their Camp, and held the Enemy buſied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whoſe fault or fortune was like) that having ſerved at Cannæ, were afterwards extremely diſgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman Horſe, what numbers eſcaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that ſaved themſelves in the firſt charge, by getting behind the River; and Tarentius the Conſul recovered Venuſia, with threeſcore and ten at the moſt in his company. That he was ſo ill attended, it is no marvail: for Venuſia lay many miles off to the Southward; ſo that his neareſt way thither, had been through the midſt of Hannibals Army, if the Paſſage had been open. Therefore it muſt needs be, that when once he got out of ſight, he turned up ſome by-way, ſo diſappointing the Numidians that hunted contra. Of ſuch as could not hold pace with the Conſul, but took other ways, and were ſcattered over the Fields; two thouſand, or thereabouts, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made Priſoners: the reſt were ſlain, all ſave three hundred; who Liv. l. 19.

diſperſed themſelves in flight, as chance led them, and got into ſundry Towns. There died in this great Battel of Cannæ, beſides L. Æmilius Paulus the Conſul; two of the Roman Quæſtors or Treaſurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourſcore Senators, or ſuch as had born Office, out of which they were to be choſen into the Senate. Many of theſe were of eſpecial mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors, or Conſuls, among whom was Cn. Servilius the laſt years Conſul, and Minutius, late Maſter of the Horſe. The number of Priſoners taken in this Battel, Livy makes no greater than three thouſand Foot, and three hundred Horſe: too few to have defended, for the ſpace of one half hour, both the Roman Camps; which yet the ſame Livy ſaith, to have been over-cowardly yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the priſoners, whom the ſame Hiſtorian ſhortly after introduceth ſpeaking in the Senate, and ſaying, That they were no leſs than eight thouſand. It may therefore be, that theſe three thouſand were only ſuch as the Enemy ſpared, when the fury of Execution was paſt: but to theſe muſt be added about five thouſand more, who yielded in the greater Camp, when their Company were either ſlain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, eſpecially the Conſul Varro, had before caſt up (as we ſay) without their Hoſt; nothing ſo chargeable, as now they find it. On the ſide of Hannibal there died ſome four thouſand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred Horſe, or thereabouts: a loſs not ſenſible, in the joy of ſo great a Victory: which if he purſued, as Maharbal adviſed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the War had preſently been at an end. But he believed not ſo far in his own proſperity, and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to uſe a Victory.

Of things following the Battel at Cannæ.

NOt without good cauſe doth Polybius reprehend thoſe two Hiſtorians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleaſure of them, unto whoſe Honour they conſecrated their Travels, than the truth of things, and information of Poſterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and Proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conſcript. No man of ſound judgment will condemn this liberty of Cenſure, which Polybius hath uſed. For, to recompence his Juniority (ſuch as it was) he produceth ſubſtantial arguments, to juſtifie his own Relation; and confuteth the vanity of thoſe former Authors, out of their own Writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains it is to be ſuſpected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either of theſe two Cities, but have ſpared ſome part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than it deſerved of his own Country. The like diſeaſe it is to be feared, that we ſhall hereafter find in others; and ſhall have cauſe to wiſh, that either they were ſomewhat leſs Roman, or elſe, that ſome Works of their oppoſite Writers were extant, that ſo we might at leaſt hear both ſides ſpeak: being henceforth deſtitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But ſince this cannot be, we muſt be ſometimes bold, to obſerve the coherence of things, and believe ſo much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reaſon, or (at leaſt) fair probability. This attentive circumſpection is needful even at the preſent: ſuch is the repugnancy or forgetfulneſs which we find in the beſt Narration, of things following the Battel of Cannæ. For it is ſaid, that four thouſand Foot and Horſe gathered together about the Conſul Terentius at Venuſia; that others, to the number of ten thouſand, got into Canuſium, chooſing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conſul Terentius Varro, joyning his Company unto thoſe of Scipio at Canuſium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well near ten thouſand men about him; that theſe Letters of the Conſul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had been taking order for pacifying thoſe Tumuls in the City, which grew upon the firſt bruit of the Overthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadors from Capua (after ſome conſultation, whether it were meet to ſend any, or, without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent unto Terentius, and found him at Venuſia, a prety while before he wrote thoſe Letters, which over-took (in a manner) at Rome the firſt news of the Overthrow. Among ſuch incoherences, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath not ſome particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no ſmall argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman Camp, and truſſed up the Spoils, forthwith he diſlodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a diſpoſition in the Hirpines, and many other People thereabout, to forſake the Roman Party, and make alliance with Carthage. The firſt Town that opened the Gates unto him, was Coſſa, where he laid up his Baggage: and leaving his Brother Mago to take in other places, He haſted into Campania. The general affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclineable unto him; not only in regard of their grievous loſſes ſuſtained abroad in the Fields, which the Romans themſelves, who could not hinder him from ſpoiling the Countrey, eſpecially the poorer ſort of them, did hardly endure; but in a loving reſpect unto that great courteſie (as it ſeemed) which he uſed, unto ſuch of them as became his Priſoners. For as at other times, ſo now alſo after his great Victory at Cannæ, He had lovingly diſmiſſed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being ſo obſtinate againſt him that had ſought to deliver them from bondage. Neither ſpared he to win their Love with Gifts; pretending to admire their Valour; but ſeeking indeed, by all ways and means to make them his, whilſt all other motives were concurrent. At this time alſo he began to deal kindly (though againſt his nature) with his Roman Priſoners: telling them, that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Eſtate; but being provoked by Injuries, ſought to right himſelf and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, ſhould bear Soveraign Rule, not which of them ſhould be deſtroyed. So he gave them leave to chooſe ten of their number, that ſhould be ſent home to treat with the Fathers about their Ranſome: and together with theſe, he ſent Carthalo a Noble Man of Carthage, and General of his Horſe, to feel the diſpoſition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by ſo much adverſity, and could ſtoop unto deſire of Peace. But with the Romans theſe Arts prevailed not, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place.

place. The People of Italy, all, or moſt of them, ſave the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their Loſſes paſt, but entertained a deceiveable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient Enemies of Rome, and not until the former Generation utterly ſubdued, began to re-aſſume their wonted Spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italy moſt bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutual affinities therewith as ſtreightly conjoyned, as were any ſave the Latines, changed on a ſudden their Love into Hatred, without any other cauſe found, than change of Fortune.

Campania is the moſt goodly and fruitful Province of Italy, if not (as ſome then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, anſwerable unto the Country whereof it was Head, ſo great, fair, and wealthy, that it ſeemed no leſs convenient a Seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all Qualities, Bravery is the leaſt requiſite unto Soveraign Command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themſelves like Jays by their Feathers, deſpiſed the unfortunate Vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there ſome of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore eſpecial regard unto the Majeſty of Rome, and could not endure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian Faction had lately ſo prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleaſure of the Multitude, which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius, an ambitious Nobleman, whoſe Credit grew, and was upheld by furthering all popular deſires: whereof the conjunction with Hannibal was not the leaſt. Some of the Capuans had offered their City to the Carthaginian, ſhortly after the Battel of Thraſymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his Journey into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearneſs of the Roman Army, or ſome other fear of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual Rebellion. They had indeed no leiſure to treat about any Articles of new Confederacy: or, had leiſure ſerved, yet were the Multitude (whoſe inconſtant Love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle uſage, and free diſmiſſing of ſome Priſoners, in good account among them) unable to hold any ſuch Negotiation, without advice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promiſed to yield up their Town to Hannibal, and to meet him on the way with ſome of their Nobility, that ſhould aſſure him of all faithful meaning; were driven to ſit ſtill in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new Friend, yet ſufficiently diſcovered themſelves, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate; on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their own Cowardize. The People holding ſo tender a regard of Liberty, that even the lawful Government of Magiſtrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppreſſion, had now good cauſe to fear, leſt the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans, bring them under a more ſtreight ſubjection than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into ſome Outrage, Pacuvius made uſe of to ſerve his own Ambition. He diſcourſed unto the Senate, as they ſate in Council, about theſe motions troubling the City: and ſaid, That he himſelf had both married a Roman Lady, and given his Daughter in Marriage to a Roman; but, that the danger of forſaking the Roman Party was not now the greateſt: for that the People were violently bent even to murther all the Senate, and afterward to joyn themſelves with Hannibal, who ſhould countenance the Fact, and ſave them harmleſs. This he ſpake as a man well known to be beloved himſelf by the People, and privy unto their deſigns. Having throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promiſed nevertheleſs to deliver them all, and to ſet things at quiet, if they would freely put themſelves into his hands, offering his Oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand, for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting up the Court, and placing a Guard of his own Followers about it, that none might enter nor iſſue forth without his leave; He called the People to aſſembly, and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them that theſe wicked Governours were ſurpriſed by his Policy, and all faſt, ready to abide what ſentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he adviſed them, as a thing which neceſſity required, that they ſhould chooſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger upon the old. So rehearſing unto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their judgment was of thoſe. All cried out, that they were worthy of Death: Chooſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, unprovided for ſuch an Election, was ſilent; until at laſt, ſome one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were utterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for ſome known fault, baſeneſs, and inſufficiency; or elſe, even becauſe they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilſt more were to be choſen (the fitteſt men to be ſubſtituted, having been named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and eaſily prevailed with the People, that the preſent Senate might for this time be ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleſs) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelves indebted, for ſaving all their Lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this, by all obſequiouſneſs, to court the People, giving their Reins unto their lawleſs Will, who elſe were likely to caſt them down: All the City being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their Gates to Hannibal. But after the Battel at Cannæ, this impediment was removed, and few there were that would open their mouths to ſpeak againſt the Rebellion. Yet foraſmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campans, did then ſerve the Romans in the Iſle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe prevailed ſo far, that Embaſſadors were ſent unto Terentius the Conſul; to ſee his preſent caſe, and what it could miniſter of Hope or Fear. Theſe whereſoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in Spirit as in Followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſervice of their State; and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented unto them, the greatneſs of the Roman Misfortune: ſaying, that all was loſt, and that the Campans muſt now, not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themſelves, but make War in their defence againſt the Carthaginians; as the Romans had had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto he is said to have added a foolish Invective, against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make Bridges of slaughtered Carkases, and to feed upon mans flesh; with such other stuff, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campans themselves, He put them in mind of their present strength: they having thirty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; with money, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came: and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring to seek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, upon these Conditions: That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Laws; That no Citizen of theirs should be subject unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soever, whether in War, or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliver unto the Campans three Hundred Roman Prisoners, such as they themselves would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen opposed himself earnestly: using, in vain, many perswasions, to the wilful and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in mind of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old Friends for new Acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Town; at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and cut it in pieces, that, by such a notable piece of service, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples, not far off, sent for Magius to come speak with him in the Camp. This Magius refused: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himself towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the Walls too high, and was not well provided, to lay Siege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great Solemnity and Pomp: all the People issuing forth of the Town, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many Noble Victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly City, and passed over his first Entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman Yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy, and Rome it self, should be driven to acknowledg Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their Enemies; He prayed them, that they would not think him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State: and use him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand upon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal setled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speak against him; being assisted by Perolla, the Son of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whilst he was at Supper, the first night of his coming, had not his Fathers Authority kept him from making any such attempt. All the Town (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of Fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other Towns thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Acerræ, were the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to find them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their Walled Towns; but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it self was in extreme fear of Hannibal's coming, at the first report of the Overthrow at Cannæ: and the grief of that loss was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the Provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loss already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the Streets were full. Courriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went; whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had throughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous Superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, buried alive Two Men and Women, Gaules and Greeks, in their Ox-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions, we may justly think, that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Devil. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked Soothsayers; whose detestable Counsels they afterwards, for their own Honour, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire, with what Prayers and Supplications they might pacifie the Gods, and obtain an end of these Calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At the same time came Letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Otacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africk. In these were contained News, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that wasted the Kingdom of Hieron, their good Friend and Confederate; and of another Fleet, riding among the Isles Ægates, which was in readiness to set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside, to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soveraign charge of the Weal publick, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of People went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, gi-giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weal-publick. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely, for up-holding the general Reputation. If his coming into the City, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their Wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their Welcome, and Thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done: But whereas Livy would have us think, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I believe him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his Head; as in Liv. l. 26. few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller Offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the Horse. These fell presently to mustering

Liv. l. 22. of Souldiers, of whom they raised Four new Legions, and a thousand Horse; though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very Boys. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten, in account of the Forces levi-
Liv. l. 23. ed by this Dictator; and Two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the Field, four new ones of Prætextati, or Striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy Slaves, that were put in hope of Liberty, if they should deserve it by manful Service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever owed Money, and could not pay it, or had committed any capital Offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arm these Companies, they were fain to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the Spoils of their Enemies that had been there set up: among which were six thousand Armours of the Gaules, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent Oppressions, that they were fain to issue forth of their own Gates, in the habit of Strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the Prisoners taken at Cannæ, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere Night out of the Roman Territory. To the Messengers of the Captives, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor Kins-folk, but the great need wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their Suit; which yet they obtained not. Besides the general custom of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthned by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken Prisoner in the former War) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the Enemy; much was alledged against these who now craved ransom: but the special point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not unto these poor men, to say, that their Offence was no greater than the Consuls: they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted Money; and therefore could not want Excuses, whereby to avoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of Redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the Slaves which were armed for the War, are said to have cost more than the Sum did amount unto, that would have ransomed these Prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance the Roman Proceedings, as if they had been severe; when as indeed they were suitable to the present fortune, poor, and somewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proof, That Hannibal valued those Roman Slaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Masters, at no more than every one the third part of a common Souldiers Ransom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for Slaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withal consider, that these private men did only lend these Slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) until the War should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for ready Money, they chose rather to say, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like austerity, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great Battel. These were charged, for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done so. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call raggione del Stato may serve for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driven to a miserable Exigent, is fain to help it self, by doing injuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Cannæ, to be transported into Sicil; and there to serve, not as others did until they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or else were fifty years of Age; but until this War should be ended, how long soever it lasted, and that without reward. The same thrifty censure, was afterwards laid upon others, for their misbehaviour: but never upon any man of Quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) upon Cæcilius Metellus, and a few other hair-brain'd Fools his Companions; who being frighted out of their Wits, with the terror of so great a loss, were devising, after the Battel, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastful to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; Liv. l. 2. nevertheless it was quietly digested, the excuse being no less apparent than the fault.

Liv. l. 24.

M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needful business within the City, took the Field with with five and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him, than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weak eſtate, only Marcellus had the Honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oſtia with a Fleet, ready to ſet Sail for Sicil, having one Legion aboard his Ships, and Fifteen Hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which Forces he was to defend that Iſland, and do what harm he could in Africk. But hearing of the Overthrow at Cannæ, he ſent theſe of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Cannuſium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campans,) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore he made great journies thitherward, and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle Walks Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: aſſaying by fair Words, and terrible Threats, the one and the other City. Naples was ſtrong, and not infected with any the leaſt touch of diſloyalty: it had alſo a ſure Haven; whereby it ſtood in the leſs fear of ſuſtaining much inconvenience, by ſpoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable conſideration, That Hannibal was Maſter of the Field: which if he laid waſte, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and ſuch talk uſed ſome, that had little fear of their own private Want or Poverty, but a great deſire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of theſe, one L. Bantius was chief; a ſtout young Gentleman, and Souldier of eſpecial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good ſervice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, half dead at Cannæ, and after much gentle uſage, good attendance, and cure of his Wounds, friendly diſmiſſed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in Honour, to return the greateſt thanks he could unto ſo courteous an Enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the ſame eaſie Nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, ſeemed to wonder, why one that had ſo well deſerved of the Roman ſtate, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who deſired nothing more than ſuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himſelf alſo a man highly reputed for his perſonal Valour, he made this Bantius ſo far in love with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, againſt the Romans, whereof he had not preſently advertiſement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and aſſayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garriſon; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory anſwer, to his diſcontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he took by compoſition; and ſo returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durſt not ſtir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garriſon; yet if they ſaw Marcellus hardly beſtead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the Enemies aſſailing him without, like enough it ſeemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accompliſhment of their own deſires. He therefore brought his Army cloſe to the Town, and skirmiſhed often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make ſhew of a meaning to force the Town; which he ſought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the Night-time there paſſed Meſſages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his Forces, could be trained into the Field, the Multitude within the Town ſhould preſently riſe; and ſeizing upon the Gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertiſed: and fearing, leſt the Conſpirators would ſhortly adventure, even to find him buſied within the City, whilſt the Carthaginians ſhould ſcale the Walls; he thought it the ſureſt way, to cut off the Enemies hope, and ſend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his Men in three Companies, within three ſeveral Gates looking towards the Enemy: He gave a ſtreight command, that all the Citizens ſhould keep their Houſes. Thus he lay cloſe a good part of the day, to the Enemies great wonder; againſt whom he had cuſtomarily iſſued forth before more early, every day, to skirmiſh. But when it was further noted, that the Walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that ſurely all was diſcovered, and Marcellus now buſied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his Men bring Ladders, and make ready for the Aſſault; which was done in all haſte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very Walls, and thought nothing leſs, than that the Romans would meet them in the Field: ſuddenly the middle Gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the beſt and oldeſt of his Souldiers, break forth upon them, with a great noiſe, to make his unexpected Sally the more terrible. Whilſt the Carthaginians, much out of order, were ſome of them flying before Marcellus, the reſt making head againſt him; the other two Gates opened, whereat in like ſort iſſued they of the new-levied Companies, upon the Enemies backs. The ſudden terror was more available unto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was ſo great, that this was accounted as a Victory, and reputed one of the braveſt Acts performed in all that War; foraſmuch as hereby it was firſt proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his Enemies that were departed, took a ſtrict account of the Citizens of Nola: condemning above threeſcore and ten of High Treaſon, whoſe Heads he ſtruck off; and ſo leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueſſula. Hannibal in the mean ſeaſon was gone to Acerræ: where being excluded, he thought it no Wiſdom to loſe time in perſwaſions, but laid Siege unto it, and began on all ſides to cloſe it up. This terrified the People, who knew themſelves unable to hold out. Therefore, before his Works were finiſhed, and they quite ſurrounded; they ſtole out by Night, and left him the Town empty: which he ſacked and burnt. Then hearing News of the Dictator, that he was about Caſiline, thither went Hannibal: as being unwilling, that an Enemy ſo near ſhould diſquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late Victory of Marcellus, had nothing abated the Spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army, seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his Men, at the most, and those not slain in plain Battel, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great fear they stood of Hannibal, and how Creast-fallen they were: that having three years since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good News, to hear, That in a Skirmish not far from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not resistless. At Casilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Prænestines there were, and above four hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battel of Cannæ, being sent by their several States to the Camp: whither whilst they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and sent them back sorrowful; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose Government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard News from Capua. How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campans into Rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many Trains laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a Night, and fortified the Western part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were, as the rest of the Campans, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountred with greater Forces: but these few found him more work than he expected. Divers Assaults he gave, but was still repelled with loss: and many Sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the Horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River, who fain would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome, about some matters of Religion, had given him express charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Suessula could not come, his way being stopped by the over-flowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campans, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the Water stayed his journey, such Entreaties were needless. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the Siege. Barrels of Corn were sent by Night, floating down the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddy of the Water, stuck among the Willows on the Bank, whereby this manner of relief was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the stream, which faintly sustained the poor besieged men. At length, when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallets; the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seed. Hannibal seeing this, admired their Patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Casiline until the Rapes were grown. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their Obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent Ransom, which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven Hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campans; unto whom he restored it. To the Prænestine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which, they had offer, in regard of their Vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Prænestе: which is no weak proof of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This Siege of Casiline was not a little beneficial to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For Winter overtook him, long before he could dispatch the business: which how to quit with his Honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he Wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithal did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

Of the great Supply that was decreed at Carthage, to be sent to Hannibal in Italy. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloath or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partial they were in their Writings.

WHen Mago, the Son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the Battel at Cannæ; his Brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyful message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his Brother had fought; what Consuls he had chaced, wounded, or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former War never shunned any occasion of Fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to Battel; that, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand Prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other People of Italy, that following the fortune of thoſe great Victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the reſt he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief ſeat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his Brother had been entertained, where he meant to reſt that Winter, attending their ſupply. As for the War, He ſaid it was even at an end, if they would now purſue it cloſely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themſelves, and repair their broken Forces. He willed them to conſider, that the War was far from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that ſo many Battels had much diminiſhed his Brothers Army; that the Souldiers, who had ſo well deſerved, ought to be conſidered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian Friends, with exactions of Money, Corn, and other neceſſaries; but that theſe things muſt be ſent from Carthage: which the Victory would requite with large amends. Finally he cauſed the golden Rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were ſlain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being meaſured, filled (as ſome ſay) three buſhels, or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatneſs of the Roman calamity, foraſmuch as none but the * principal of that Order, were accuſtomed to wear that Ornament.

Who ſo conſiders the former Punick War, may eaſily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any ſuch hopeful advertiſements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinary welcom. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverſe to the faction of Hanno, is ſaid to have demanded of that great perſwader unto peace with Rome, Whether he were ſtill of opinion, that Hannibal ſhould be yielded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the Gods, for this their good ſucceſs. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the ſame formal Anſwer, which Livy puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conſcripti, by a term proper to the Romans, and putting them in mind of his own ſhameful overthrow received at the Iſlands Ægateis: yet the ſum of his ſpeech appears to have been no leſs malicious, than it is ſet down, foraſmuch as Hannibal himſelf, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed againſt the wickedneſs of this Hanno; ſaying, that his hatred againſt the Barchines, had oppreſſed their Family, when otherwiſe it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made ſuch a jeſt of theſe Victories, as is reported; ſaying, It ill beſeemed him, who had vanquiſhed the Romans, to call for more help, as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their Camp, filled forſooth with ſpoyl, to make requeſt for Meat and Money. To theſe Cavils, if Anſwer were needful, it might be ſaid, That other booty than of Horſes and Slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Camp: the beſt of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the Field, than a few [a] ſilver Studs in the Bridles and Trappings of their Horſes. If Hannibal had taken any main Convoy of Money and Proviſions, going to ſupply all wants of a great Army in ſome other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards ſaid to have done, when they wan the Camp of Aſdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might ſuch an objection more juſtly have been made unto his demand of a ſupply. But the moſt likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he beſt might hope to prevail, contained a perſwaſion to uſe their fortune with moderation; and now to ſeek Peace, whilſt they had ſo much the better in War.

What would have been the iſſue of this counſel, if it had been followed, it were not eaſie to ſay. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of War, yet it is not likely, that the faith, ſo often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have been kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of ſo many ſhameful overthrows; ſince after this War ended, and a new League concluded, no ſubmiſſive behaviour could preſerve Carthage from ruine, longer than until ſuch time, as Rome was at leiſure from all other Wars. This counſel therefore of Hanno, though it might ſeem temperate, was indeed very peſtilent; and ſerved only to hinder the performance of a noble reſolution. For it was concluded by a main conſent of the Senate, that forty thouſand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of Silver, ſhould be ſent over to Hannibal: and that, beſides theſe, twenty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe, ſhould be levied in Spain; not only to ſupply, as need ſhould require, the Armies in that Province, but to be tranſported into Italy.

This great aid, had it been as carefully ſent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Hiſtorians would not have found cauſe, to tax the wretchleſs improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreſhing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finiſhed the buſineſs, with leſs dangerous adventure; and the pleaſures, which his men enjoyed among the Campans, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following War. But either the too much careleſneſs of thoſe, that were loth to make haſte in laying out their money, before extream neceſſity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than ſenſe of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been ſo well ſet down. The [b] Elephants were ſent: and [b] Liv. l. 28. ſome money peradventure; uncertain it is, how long after. But thoſe great Forces of threeſcore thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe, came not into Italy, till much was loſt of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was firſt conſumed by Time, and ſundry accidents of War. Only ſome ſmall numbers, no way anſwering unto the proportion decreed, were ſent into Spain; and the journey of Aſdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were paſt, and the Romans had recovered their ſtrength.

Here we may note, what great Riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by the Tributes received from their Subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, ſince the War of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious Tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greateſt neceſſity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoveriſhed Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of ſo much money, as was to be diſburſed for redeeming of Peace, after the loſs at Ægateis.

Yet

* Thus Livy reports it: and credible it is, that while Rome was poor, the bravery of private men was not altogether ſo great, as the Law would have permitted; though otherwiſe Jus Annuli, The wearing of the Ring, was the general priviledge of the Roman Equites.

[a] Liv. l. 22.

Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on Foot, are appointed to the service in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, having three or four years together been forced to some extraordinary cost, are fain to go upon credit, even for the price of those Slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arm for their defence. Such advantage, in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all Parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-City in the bottom of the streights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground; and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it self, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would again rebel. For the Carthaginians, having given up Hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform whatsoever should be enjoyned them, with condition that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yielded up all their Weapons, and Engines of War; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the Body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withal, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other Place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize, by which ye now live, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholsom kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainly shews, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in Riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I think; and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present Wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these Times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering Wealth, were more industrious and skilful than the Romans; so came they far short of them, in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or most of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in Victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the War strongly, was over-past, go more leisurely to work, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy; so going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of Fortune, against the Enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so do) finished the War, might easily make * Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the Forces that she had given them to the Conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own Slackness, Incredulity, dulness, or Niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursements in Spain, than to set up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and so open a Coast as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been to make a running War, by which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their main intendment against Rome it self, until such time as every little Thorn were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province: then must Emporiæ have been besieged and forced: which by reason of Alliance with the Massilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the Town of Emporiæ was too strong to be won in haste: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of Wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Town of the same Name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Grecians, though not over-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Town of Emporiæ, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would have been a work of little less difficulty, than was the Roman War (in appearance) after the Battel at Cannæ: yea it had been in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the War; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgment, near unto the Gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt being such, as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making strong War upon their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seat of the War, transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private Affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their own purposes, did make them easily wink at Opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious Wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the Purse full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the Noble House of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travel for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had been somewhat more than needful. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far less honourable than the People of Rome: not only in Government of their ſubject Provinces, but in adminiſtration of their own Eſtate; few of them preferring the reſpect of the Weal publick above their private intereſt. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parſimony uſed toward their own Mercinaries, when the former Roman War was finiſhed: ſo the concluſion of this War preſent, will make them complain, with feeling Sighs, of their Negligence in ſupplying Hannibal, after the Victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would give all their Treaſures, to redeem the Opportunity, that now they let paſs, as if it were coſt enough to ſend a few Handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spaniſh buſineſs, and the State of Africk it ſelf, depended wholly, or for the moſt part, upon ſucceſs of things in Italy; the courſe of Actions following will make manifeſt. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governors, it is very hard, and almoſt impoſſible, to ſet down. For though we muſt not reprehend, in that worthy Hiſtorian Livy, the tender love of his own Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others: yet muſt we not, for his ſake, believe thoſe lies, which the unpartial judgment of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them Original. It were needleſs to rehearſe all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Hiſtorian Fabius. One Example may ſuffice. He ſaith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former War, That having clean ſpent their ſtrength, and being even broken with many miſeries, they were glad to ſubmit themſelves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the Life of Amilcar, ſet down by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in ſuch ſort held by the Carthaginians, that it ſeemed to be in as good condition, as if in thoſe parts there had not been any War. Theſe Words, heing referred to the brave reſolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the ſingular Vertue of their General infuſing ſuch ſpirit into them; may be taken as not over-liberal. For in the Treaty of Peace between Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman firſt of all required, that this Garriſon of Eryx ſhould lay down their Arms, and forſake Sicil, threatning, that otherwiſe he would not talk of any Compoſition: Amilcar boldly bad him chuſe, whether he would talk of it, or no; for that the Arms which his Countrey had put into his hands to uſe againſt her Enemies, it was not his purpoſe to yield up unto them. Now ſince the Romans, contrary to their cuſtom upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his Will, and not to ſtand with him upon point of Honour, whilſt otherwiſe they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were far from thinking him a man conſumed with miſeries, as Fabius would have him ſeem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by Name, chargeth Fabius with untruth; ſaying, that howſoever Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themſelves as men that had no ſenſe thereof; and were as far from being either vanquiſhed, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as alſo perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman Story) and thoſe that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: we muſt take it in good part, that howſoever Livy introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very fooliſhly his own ſhameful Overthrow at the Iſlands * Ægateis, with the great ſervices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet † elſewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the ſame Hanno his Mouth, making him ſay, That the Affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the loſs of their Fleet in that Battel at Sea: wherein himſelf was General. Now concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cauſe to wiſh, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like ſtamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livy to his Rome, had not cauſed him to think too well of their Relations: which are ſuch as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman Victories in Spain, before Aſdrubal, the Son of Amilcar, followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italy.

IT hath been ſhewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul, returning from Gaul into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his deſcent from the Alpes, ſent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with fourteen thouſand Foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred Horſe, had been allotted unto this Conſul, therewith to make War in Spain againſt Hannibal: who ſince he was marching into Italy with the ſtrength of his Army, P. Scipio believed, that a good part of theſe his own Forces might well be ſpared from the Spaniſh Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry ſome of the number back with him, ſending on his brother with the reſt, as his Lieutenant. Publius himſelf remained in Italy all the time of his Conſulſhip: which being expired, He was ſent Proconſul into Spain, by the Senate, with an Army of Eight thouſand Men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of theſe two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, ſomewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain, againſt the Carthaginians: whom they vanquiſhed in ſo many Battels, and withdrew from their Alliance ſo many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cauſe to wonder, how the Enemy could ſo often find means to repair his Forces, and return ſtrong into the Field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Countrey from the Tyranny of Carthage, might eaſily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African Yoke, and durſt adventure to break it: ſo the ancient Reputation of the firſt Conquerors, might ſerve to arm the Naturals againſt theſe Invaders; and to reclaim thoſe, that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of ſuch ill ſucceſs, as the like Rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treaſure: which eaſily raiſed Souldiers, among thoſe valiant, but (in that Age) poor, and Gold-thirſty Nations. Neither was it of ſmall importance, that ſo many of the Spaniards had their Children, Kinſmen, and Friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or ſerving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if we durſt be bold to ſay it; the Victories of the Scipio's were neither ſo many, nor ſo great, as they are ſet out by Livy. This we may be bold to ſay, That the great Captain Fabius, or Livy in his perſon, maketh an Objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livy for him, doth anſwer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Asdrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of a Battel, save only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his Money, Elephants, and broken Troops, over Tagus, directly toward the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; upon which he fell with more than threescore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his Retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his Money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to have done in the last Battel between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian Records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us: unto whom it were no Wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Liv. l. 28.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporiæ, an Haven-Town not far within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same Name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his Clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the Story begins of him, I could easily believe, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his Clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and having no Jurisdiction in the Countrey. Yet is it certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practise had the better success, for that he seemed to have none other Errand, than setting them at liberty. This Pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with Money; and some he compelled to yield by force or fear; especially, when he had won a Battel against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord made with these People, likely it is that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgot, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Majestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conservent, which is, as Tully interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ; of the Roman Jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrey wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Countrey unto Hanno and his Heirs,) He made him not only Lieutenant General over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferior Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno, at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the coming of Scipio; with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyn; it being the custom of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milancis, in the Age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present evil which they felt, than regardful of the greater mischief, whereinto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which it is like, that some Forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a Battel with Scipio; wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this Victory, Scipio besieged Stissum, a Town hard by, and wan it. But Asdrubal having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand Foot and a thousand Horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far about Tarracon, whom he found careless, as after a Victory, roving abroad in the Countrey; and with great slaughter drave them aboard their Ships. This done, he ran up into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Illergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aid his Fleet: where having set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia, their chief City, to pay a Fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town; which they defended thirty days; hoping in vain, that the sharp Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodg. But they were fain at length to yield: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of Silver. During the Siege, the Lacetani came to help their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next news that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ; subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold War against Scipio, without any assistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Asdrubal, as it were by a Charm, stirred up the Illergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Arms in his Quarrel; whilst himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Countrey, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his Ships, whence whence he durſt not ſtir, until Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving ſome few Garriſons to defend thoſe places, that after Scipio wan, by returning upon them, unlooked for, through a deep Snow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the reſt, we may reaſonably think, that they ſought their own benefit: helping themſelves one while by the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; and contrariwiſe, upon ſenſe of injuries received, or apprehenſion of more grievous Tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by theſe new Maſters, hearkening again unto the comfortable promiſes of thoſe, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Countrey Laws, and not under Governors ſent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may teſtifie: even from henceforth unto the days of Auguſtus Cæſar; till when they were never throughly conquered.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a Victory againſt the Carthaginians, in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, moſt of their men being on ſhore. All their Ships, that ran not too far on ground, he took, and thereby grew Maſter of the whole Coaſt; landing at pleaſure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this Victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Eſtates in Spain, are ſaid to have ſubmitted themſelves unto the Romans, and given Hoſtages: whereby Aſdrubal was compelled to fly into the utmoſt corners of the Land, and hide himſelf in Luſitania. Yet it follows; that the Illergetes did again rebel; that Aſdrubal hereupon came over Iberus, and that Scipio (though having eaſily vanquiſhed the Illergetes) went not forth to meet him, but ſtirred up againſt him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his Subjects and had given him Hoſtages. Theſe took from the Carthaginian three Towns, and vanquiſhed him in two Battels, wherein they ſlew fifteen thouſand of his Men, and took four thouſand Priſoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the ſupply before mentioned: and henceforward the two Brethren joyntly adminiſtred the buſineſs in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian War, the two Scipio's did, haud cunctanter, without fear or doubt, paſs over Iberus, and beſiege Saguntum. Little cauſe of doubt had they, if Cn. had already ſubdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the ſame Celtiberians, that with their proper Forces were able to vanquiſh Aſdrubal. Boſtar, the Governour of Saguntum, a ſimple man, ſuffered himſelf to be perſwaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the Country, was by freely reſtoring unto them their Hoſtages; as reſting, without any pledge, aſſured of their Faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being truſted with this Meſſage and Reſtitution of the Hoſtages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: perſwading them, as he had done Boſtar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchaſed much Love: if the Tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we find, that all the Spaniſh Hoſtages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearſing ſo many particularities, whereof I can believe ſo few. But ſince we find no better certainties, we muſt content our ſelves with theſe.

The year following was like unto this: Aſdrubal muſt be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their Forces: Cn. makes War by Land; P. by Sea. Aſdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make reſiſtance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Maſters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans, becauſe they had been chidden the laſt year for their Negligence, which had betraied the Navy. The revolt of theſe Ship-Maſters animates to Rebellion the Carpeſians, or Carpetani, an In-land People about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. Theſe do much miſchief, ſo that Aſdrubal is fain to make a Journey to them. His ſudden coming cuts off ſome of them that were found ſcattered abroad in the Fields. But they making head, ſo valiantly aſſail him, that they drive him, for very fear, to incamp himſelf ſtrongly on an high piece of ground, whence he dares not come forth to give them Battel. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his Proviſions; and ſhortly make themſelves Maſters of the Country round about. This good ſucceſs breeds negligence, for which they dearly pay. Aſdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the moſt of them, and diſperſeth the reſt, ſo that the whole Nation yieldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Aſdrubal ſhould lead his Army forthwith into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his Letters in what hard caſe he was, and had ſo weakly ſupplied him, as is ſhewed before. But thus we find it reported, and that upon the very rumour of this his Journey, almoſt all Spain was already to fall to the Romans. Aſdrubal therefore ſends word preſently to Carthage, That this muſt not be ſo: or if they will needs have it ſo, that then they muſt ſend him a Succeſſor, and well attended with a ſtrong Army, which to imploy, they ſhould find work more than enough; ſuch notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuſe: Aſdrubal muſt needs be gone; and Himilco, with ſuch Forces as are thought expedient for that Service, both by Land and Sea, is ſent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Aſdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furniſh himſelf with ſtore of Money, that he might have wherewithal to win the Friendſhip of the Gauls; through whoſe Countries he muſt paſs, as Hannibal had done before him. the Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to eaſe him of this care. But ſince it can be no better, he lays great impoſitions upon all the Spaniards his Subjects: and having gotten together as much Treaſure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberius. The Scipio's hearing theſe news, are careful how to arreſt him on the way. They beſiege Ibera (ſo called of the Rivers name running by it) the richeſt Town in all thoſe Quarters, that was confederate with Aſdrubal: who thereupon ſteps aſide to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a Battel with him: which they win the more eaſily, for that the Spaniards, his Followers, had rather be vanquiſhed at home, than get the Victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are ſlain, and few ſhould have eſcaped, but that the Spaniards ran away, ere the Battels were throughly joyned. Their Camp the Romans take and ſpoil: whereby (queſtionleſs) they are marvelouſly enriched; all the Money that could be raked together in Spain, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This days event joyns all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country ſtood in doubt before; and puts Aſdrubal ſo far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him ſmall hope of keeping him-himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, Liv. l. 23. That they have neither Money, Apparel, nor Bread, wherewith to sustain their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting, so as unless they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their Forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evil season, the State being scarcely able, after the loss at Cannæ, to help it self at home. Yet relief is sent, how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that Love and Care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is less questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we think; that remember the last news of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his own safety? They find him, and Mago, and Amilcar, the Son of Bomilcar, with an Army of threescore thousand Men, besieging Iliturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably conjecture to have stood, where Carinena is now, in the Kingdom of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterward called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Illergetes, their neerest Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The Town is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of Victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and having victualled the place, encourage the Townsmen to defend their Walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in Liv. l. 23. their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threescore thousand: and killing more of the Enemies, than themselves were in number, drive all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one, out of his quarter; and took that day, besides Prisoners and other Booty, fifty and eight Ensigns. The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning Money by War, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred whence the Carthaginians had Money to pay them; since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Countrey, wanting Money of his own; and being beaten in this journey, had lost his wealthy Carriages, when his Camp was taken after the Battel by Ibera. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are beaten again at Incibili: where there were of them above thir- Liv. l. 23. teen thousand slain, and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Livy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous Victories; whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum Album, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, P. Scipio incampeth; and stores the place with Victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Countrey round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian Horse have charged the Romans in their March, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some straglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in March, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoveful, to retire unto some place more assured. So Pub. withdraws himself unto Mons Victoriæ: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, overlooks the Southern Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him; His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal, the Son of Gesco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the Enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himself to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, until his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great City of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a Wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being far distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Bætis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians pass over Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman Garrison; hoping to win it by Famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the Rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the year before. But thither they go: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them the next day, and in two Battels kills above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them Prisoners, with six and thirty Ensigns. This Victory (doubtless) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that Siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Munda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great Battel fought, that lasteth four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable Victory; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand Prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians fly to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the Field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians again: but kills not half so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Not- Liv. l. 24. withstanding all these Overthrows, the Spaniards, a people framed even by Nature to set War on foot, quickly fill up the broken Troops of Asdrubal: who having also hired some of the Gaules, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again, and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensigns, and other Appurtenances. After so many Victories, the Romans are even ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entred into this War. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Countrey once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to bluſh, for having ſo long forborn to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the preſent they win Saguntum, and reſtore the poſſeſſion thereof unto ſuch of the poor diſperſed Citizens, as they can find out. They alſo waſte and deſtroy the Countrey of the Turdetani, that had miniſtred unto Hannibal matter of quarrel againſt the Saguntines. This laſt Action (queſtionleſs) was much to their Honour; and wherein we may be aſſured, that the Carthaginians would have diſturbed them, if they had been able.

But over-looking now this long continuance of great Victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave Exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the ſtopping of Aſdrubal's journey; which was indeed of greateſt importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporiæ, an Haven-Town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phocæans, kin to the Maſſilians, friends to the Romans; They have eaſily won to their party, loſt, recovered, and loſt again, ſome petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perſwaſion, other whiles by force, and ſometimes by their own unſetled paſſions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire poſſeſſion; who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may eaſily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by ſurpriſe: which is to be ſuſpected, ſince in this Action we find no particulars remembred, as when the ſame place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in ſome notable Fight. In like ſort alſo muſt we think, that all thoſe Battels lately remembred, after every one of which Aſdrubal ſate down before ſome place that had rebelled, or ſeemed ready to rebel, were proſperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the cuſtom of Armies vanquiſhed, to carry the War from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themſelves within their own places of ſtrength, and therein to attend the levy and arrival of new ſupplies. And ſurely, if the Romans had been abſolute Maſters of the Field, when they wan Saguntum, they would not have conſumed a whole year following, in practiſing only with the Celtiberians, the next adjoyning People. Yet made they this, little leſs than two years buſineſs. Of theſe Celtiberians we hear before, That they have yielded up themſelves unto the Romans; for ſecurity of their Faith, given Hoſtages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made War againſt the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is ſtrange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expreſs condition of a great ſum, hired to ſerve in the Roman Camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; unleſs perhaps in thoſe days it were the Roman cuſtom, or rather the cuſtom of ſome bad Author whom Livy follows, to call every Meſſenger, or Stragler, that entred their Camp, an Hoſtage of that People from whom he came.

" The Celtiberians at length, hired with great Rewards, ſend an Army of thirty thouſand to help the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fitteſt men are choſen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Countreymen that follow Hannibal in his Wars. But if any of theſe three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him ſuch news of the Riches and Welfare of Hannibal's Men, that all his fellows at home are the leſs unwilling to follow Aſdrubal, when he ſhall next have a deſire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when theſe Mercinary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the Field. The two Scipio's, preſuming on this acceſs of ſtrength, divide their forces, and ſeek out the Enemies; who lie not far off with three Armies. Aſdrubal, the Son of Amilcar, is neareſt at hand: even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being deſtroyed, Mago, and Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, hearing the news, will make uſe of their diſtance, which is five days March, and, by running into the furtheſt parts of the Countrey, ſave themſelves from being overtaken. Publius therefore muſt make the more haſte, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army; leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes ſomewhat the ſooner to his lives end. Mago, and Aſdrubal, the ſon of Geſco, are not ſtudying how to run away: they find no ſuch neceſſity. They joyn their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him ſo hardly, that he is driven to keep himſelf cloſe within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himſelf not well aſſured. Eſpecially he is vexed by Maſaniſſa, Prince of the Maſſæſyli, Numidians bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chief Honour of this ſervice is aſcribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous caſe P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spaniſh Prince, is coming with ſeven thouſand and five hundred of the Sueſſetani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be ſtreight ſhut up, and beſieged, He iſſues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way; leaving T. Fonteius, his Lieutenant, with a ſmall Company, to defend the Camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able according to his hope, to defeat him at the firſt encounter. The Fight continues ſo long, that the Numidian Horſe appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all ſides: neither are the Carthaginians far behind; but come ſo faſt upon him in Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, yet fighting, and animating his Men, where need moſt requireth, is ſtruck through with a Launce, and ſlain: very few of his Army eſcaping the ſame deſtiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio, within nine and twenty days after. At his meeting with Aſdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercinaries all forſake him; pretending that they had War in their own Countrey. If Anitorgis, where Aſdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it; a Celtiberian Town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may juſtly believe, that they were won by Aſdrubal, and eaſily perſwaded to take as much Money for not fighting, as they ſhould have had for hazarding their lives. Cn. Scipio therefore being unable to ſtay them; and no leſs unable, without their help, either to reſiſt the Enemy, or to joyn with his Brother, makes a very violent Retreat; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Aſdrubal preſſeth hard upon him: and Mago, with Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, having made an end of Publius, haſten to diſpatch his brother after him. Scipio ſteals from them all, by night; but is overtaken the next day by their Horſe, and arreſted, in an open place of hard ſtony ground, where grows not ſo much as a ſhrub, unfit for defence of his Legions againſt ſuch Ene-

Enemies. Yet a little Hill he finds, of easie ascent on every side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packsaddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that saving themselves, I know not how, within some Woods adjoyning, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his Camp, as is before said. It is a terrible Overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as affoarded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and shrowd themselves within Woods adjoyning, I should much wonder, did not a greater Miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's Camp, on the North side of Iberus, fearful (as may be supposed) of his own life; since his General, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman, of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to choose a General by most voices, prefer this L. Martius before Fonteius, the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Asdrubal, the Son of Gesco, coming upon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his Men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slain) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beats the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable Victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely sounds the Retreat; reserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness grows, in Enemies lately vanquished, and now again little better than taken: But when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former security; and utterly despising him, set neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinel, but rest secure, as if no Enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Souldiers with lively words, and tells them, That there is no adventure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being undertaken. They are soon perswaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and steals upon the Camp of Asdrubal: where finding no Guard, but the Enemies fast asleep, or very drowzy. He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Camp, Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the Rampart: which as many do as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Asdrubal, the Son of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two Camps he hath bestowed a Roman Cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarm before his coming; Martius hastens to be there as soon as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning upon this further Camp: which with no great difficulty he enters; and, partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman Shields, foul, and bloodied with their former Execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can save themselves from the fury of the Sword. Thirty seven thousand of the Enemies perish in this nights work; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, that are taken Prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the Camp of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slain: and that in another Battel with Asdrubal, there were slain ten thousand more; besides four thousand three hundred and thirty taken Prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livy therefore hath elsewhere well observed, That there is none so intemperate as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in Battels. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his Souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livy reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Martius got a great name; which he might well do, if with so small forces, and in such distress, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far less than that which is here set down.

Of these Occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judg him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, He stiled himself Propretor. The Fathers were no less moved with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore took such careful order, for supplying their Forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome; ere the Companies, levied to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the City it self, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for that title of Proprætor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman Foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the Affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and affoarded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the Victories of Martius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the Overthrows received, than of those miraculous Victories, whereof Martius had made his Vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaim, it could not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal, the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no issue, but only through a streight, whereon the Roman seized at his first coming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himself thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition, that he and his Army might be thence dismissed; That he spent many days in entertaining Parley with Claudius about this business, That night by night he conveyed his Foot-men (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no less cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Countrey, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the Foot-men could hardly creep out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needful that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the Conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far less value. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain; or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Prætor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their Election, and sent a Prætor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needful to work regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved Memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same Family. Whether upon these, or upon other Reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province, and Publius the Son of P. Scipio, sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the War into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrey. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty; and other Vertues that purchase love; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the tenor of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, savouring a little too much of the great Alexander's Vanity; How he used to walk alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; How a Dragon (which must have been one of the Gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than meer Fables, devised by Historians, who sought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this noble City might seem, not only to have surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principal Citizens offer himself as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on an high place, where he might be seen of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the Victories of L. Martius no better than dreams: and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Prætor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal, the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I find in the too partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus, as Prætor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporiæ; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a Majesty, as bred a wonderful Opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the less they could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some think, all the next year) he did nothing, but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against New Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse, his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Town by Land and Sea; and won it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fishermen of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the Walls; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of New Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in scituation; standing upon a demy-Island, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Western side of the Walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake, which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding in some part thereof a shelf, whereon at low water men might pass knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navil, Scipio thrust thereinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the Walls without resistance: the place being left without Guard, as able to defend it self by the natural strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City; easily forced a Gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livy himself cannot certainly affirm; but is fain to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of Riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive, how how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spain, was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtesie; restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Illergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, and joyned with the Romans. The Speech of Indibilis, King of the Illergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly Fugitives use, of the pleasure which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians; and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Illergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing have been devised more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans never Masters of the Countrey, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, wan unto himself the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this loss, were very sorry: yet nevertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, having stoln a Town by surprise, was too far transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his mood, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, undertook New Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, sate down before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had been undiscovered, and the Town held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the Son of Gesco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingring War of taking and re-taking Towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian Forces, under Asdrubal, the Son of Amilcar, went to a greater Enterprise; even to fight in trial of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the Name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal; his Vantcourrers charged so lustily the Carthaginian Horse, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small piece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the foreside; by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he strongly incamped himself: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plain; into which he descended more upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within his Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazard of a Battel, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to fly. Out of such a Battel, wherein he lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed Troops, to have marched towards the Pyrenees, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless Mago, and Asdrubal, the Son of Gesco, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the Name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs, have too long detained us.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumius, the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gaules. Philip, King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans, joyning with the Ætolians, make War upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage, of such mighty aid, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans Corn into his own Barns, and to drive away their Cattel to Geryon: his Victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open Field. He might perhaps have forc'd some walled Towns, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannæ: but had he spent much time about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, until Corn were ripe, would have grievouſly puniſhed him for ſuch employment of the Summer. This may have been the reaſon, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome after his Victory at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his firſt coming; want of Victuals would have compelled him to quit the Enterpriſe. Yea many of the People that opened ſo haſtily their Gates unto him, upon the freſh bruit of his glorious ſucceſs, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the Event of another Battel: if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of neceſſaries to continue a Siege before it, repelled (as might ſeem) from the Walls of Rome, he had preſented himſelf unto them with a leſſened Reputation, ſomewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unleſs they would freely yield it. But this great part of the care and travel was paſt, when ſo many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old Enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleaſure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay Siege unto that proud City, which ſo long had held them in ſubjection. Thus the Winter was paſſed over joyfully, ſaving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to ſecond the welcome report of thoſe mighty Forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promiſed ſupply, there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere theſe came, I find not: only we find, that after this he had above Thirty of them; whereas all, ſave one, that he brought over the Alpes, had been loſt in his journey through the Marſhes of Hetruria. Very bad excuſe of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his Friends, they told him truly, what Miſchiefs the perſwaſion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwiſe, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a ſafer, though a farther way about, to paſs along through Spain and Gaule, as he himſelf had done; and increaſe the Army, by hiring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the main ſtrength of their City, to the hazard of the Seas: eſpecially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that ſhould carry ſuch a number of Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with all needful Proviſions. With theſe allegations Hannibal muſt reſt content; and ſeek, as well as he can, to ſatisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year ſerved, he took the Field: and having finiſhed what reſted to be done at Caſilinum, ſought to make himſelf Maſter of ſome good Haven-Town thereabout, that might ſerve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet; or take from his Enemies at home all excuſe, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the ſame purpoſe, and to do what elſe was needful, he ſent Himilco unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to aſſay all quarters of Italy, yea the Iſles of Sicil and Sardinia; ſince the Siege of Rome muſt needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or over-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who ſlew above Two thouſand of his Men, with the loſs of fewer than Three hundred Romans. But Himilco ſped far better. By help of the Brutians, his good Friends, he wan Petellia, or Petilia, by force; after it had held out ſome Months. He wan likewiſe Conſentia, and Croton, that was forſaken by the Inhabitants. Alſo the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yielded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over-againſt Sicil.

The great Faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable teſtimony of the good Government, under which the Roman Subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campans, and others, whoſe earneſtneſs in Rebellion may ſeem to prove the contrary; we are to conſider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soveraignty, and were now tranſported with ambition: which Reaſon can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did ſend to Rome for help: where their Meſſengers received anſwer from the Senate, That the publick Misfortunes had not left means to relieve their Aſſociates that were ſo far diſtant. The Petilian Meſſengers (Embaſſadors they are termed, as were all others, publickly ſent from Cities of the Roman Subjection, that had a private Juriſdiction within themſelves) fell down to the ground, and humbly beſought the Fathers, not to give them away: promiſing to do and ſuffer whatſoever was poſſible in defence of their Town againſt the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to conſultation again: and having throughly conſidered all their Forces remaining, plainly confeſſed, that it was not in their power to give any relief. Wherefore theſe Embaſſadors were willed to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own ſafety; as having already diſcharged their Faith to the utmoſt. All this notwithſtanding, the Petilians (as was ſaid) held out ſome Months; and having ſtriven in vain to defend themſelves, when there was no apparent poſſibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloody Victory over them; being vanquiſhed as much by Famine, as by any violence of the Aſſailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in ſuch ill caſe, that Hannibal, with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them into terms of great Extremity. For whereas, in a great bravery, before their loſs at Cannæ; they had ſhewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithſtanding the great War that lay upon them ſo near at hand: it now fell out miſerably all at once, that their Fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Poſthumius Albinus their Pretor they had ſent, with an Army of five and twenty thouſand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King, Pineus, they had ſent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was paſt, willing him, if he deſired forbearance, to deliver Hoſtages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip, King of Macedon, they had ſent, to require, that he ſhould deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebel, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tidings, little ſuitable to their former glorious conceits. Poſthumius, with all his Army, was cut in pieces by the Gaules, in ſuch ſort, that ſcarce Ten men eſcaped. The manner of his overthrow was very ſtrange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Luana, through which he was to paſs. Againſt his coming, the Enemies had ſawed the Trees ſo far, that a little force would ſerve to caſt them down. When therefore Poſthumius, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous paſſage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, began to caſt down the Trees: which falling one againſt another, bore all down ſo faſt, that the Romans were were over-whelmed, Men and Horſes; in ſuch wiſe, that no more eſcaped, than is ſaid before. How this tedious work, of ſawing ſo many Trees, could take deſired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made fruſtrate, either by ſome wind, that might have blown all down before the Romans entred, or by ſome other of thoſe many accidents, whereto the device was ſubject, I do not well conceive. Yet ſome ſuch thing may have been done; and what failed in the ſtratagem, ſupplied with the Enemies Sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the ſavage condition, wherewith Lombardy, a Countrey now ſo civil, was infected in elder times, That of Poſthumius his skull, being cleanſed, and trimmed up with Gold, a drinking Cup was made, and conſecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy Veſſel, for the uſe of the Prieſt in their Solemnities. Of this great overthrow when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leſs than the calamity. But Sorrow could give no remedy to the Miſchief: and Anger was vain, where there wanted Forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I find, that any was a ſecond time demanded: this we find, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus, Illyrian Kings, as alſo with Gentius, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even terms; intreating their aſſiſtance againſt Philip and Perſeus; not commanding their duty, as Vaſſals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having aſſured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leiſure to look into the doings abroad, he ſent Embaſſadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a League, upon theſe conditions; That the King in Perſon ſhould come into Italy, and with all his Forces, by Land and Sea, aſſiſt the Carthaginians in the Roman War, until it were finiſhed; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the Spoil therein to be gotten, ſhould be left intire unto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army, ſhould paſs into Greece, and there aſſiſt Philip, until he had ſubdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving ſemblably unto him the full poſſeſſion of that Countrey, and the Iſles adjoyning. But ſuch pre-diſpoſition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the Divine Providence, which therein ſhews it ſelf not (as Herodotus falſly terms it, and like an Atheiſt) envious or malicious, but very juſt and majeſtical, in upholding that unſpeakable greatneſs of Soveraignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The firſt Embaſſadors that Philip ſent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold Lie, ſaying, That they were ſent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his help in this time of great neceſſity. Theſe news were ſo welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feaſted; and friendly diſmiſſed, with Guides that ſhould lead them the way, and ſhew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus inſtructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the Camp of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better faſhion; and concluded the buſineſs, about which they came, upon the points before remembred. In their return homeward, they happened again unluckily to be deſcried by the Roman Fleet; which, miſtruſting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chace. They did their beſt to have eſcaped: but being overtaken, they ſuffered the Romans to come aboard; and truſting to the Lie that once had ſerved them, ſaid it again, That having been ſent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reaſon of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius, the Pretor, unto whom they had ſignified the good affection of the King their Maſter. The Tale was now leſs credible than before: and (which marred all) Geſco, Baſtar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were ſent with them from Hannibal, to ratifie the Agreement, being preſently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquiſition ſerved to find all out: ſo that at length Hannibal's own Letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole buſineſs confeſſed. The Embaſſadors, and their followers, were ſent cloſe Priſoners to Rome: where the chief of them were caſt into Priſon, and the reſt ſold for bond-ſlaves. Yet one of their Ships that eſcaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embaſſage was ſent, that went and returned with better ſpeed; concluding, as was agreed before; only with ſome loſs of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian War, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their ſhoulders were overburdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble reſolution; and ſuitable unto that, whereby they kept off the ſtorm, that elſe would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more eaſie, with ſmall Forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their ſtrength to reſiſt him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For that the very Reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in ſuch a time, would have ſufficed to ſhake the allegiance not only of the Latines, and other their moſt faithful Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies that held all Priviledges of the City, it will appear by the following ſucceſs of things. M. Valerius, the Pretor, with Twenty Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend the Macedonian: and to ſet on foot ſome commotion in Greece; or to nouriſh the troubles already therein begun. Philip was buſie about the Sea-Towns, that looked towards Italy, ſetting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum, which he wan, and ſo returned to Apollonia again. The Epyrots craved help of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kind Offers, who had none other buſineſs to do. The Garriſon that Philip had left in Oricum, was ſtrong enough to hold the Townſmen in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whoſe daring to attempt any thing againſt him, on that ſide the Sea, Philip as then had no ſuſpicion. Valerius therefore eaſily re-gained the Town, and ſent thence a Thouſand Men, under Nævius Criſpus, an undertaking and expert Captain; which got by night into Apollonia. Theſe made a notable Sally; and break into Philip's Trenches with ſo great ſlaughter, that they forced him to forſake his Camp, and raiſe the Siege. The King purpoſed (as it is ſaid) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his Fleet from Oricum, ſtopped up the mouth of the River; ſo that he was fain to burn his Ships, (which belike were were no better than long boats) and depart ill furniſhed of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation always Enemy to the Crown of Macedon: and eaſily perſwaded them (being ſo affected, as hath elſewhere been ſhewed) to make ſtrong War on Philip; wherein he promiſed them great aſſiſtance from the Romans. That which moſt moved the troubleſome Spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promiſe, as if already it had been his own. So a League was made between them: and afterward ſolemnly publiſhed at Olympia, by the Ætolians, and by the Romans in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which ſpace Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey ſhould be ſubdued, and left unto the Ætolians; the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it ſhould be with Proviſion, to hold no longer, than whilſt he abſtained from doing injury to the Romans, or their Aſſociates. This was indeed the only point, whereat Valerius aimed: who promiſed as much on the Romans behalf, That they ſhould not make peace with the Macedonian, unleſs it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this League was place reſerved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to thoſe that had made or favoured the ſide of Cleomenes againſt the Macedonian, to enter at their pleaſure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the firſt of which reigned at Pergamus, in Aſia the leſs, a Prince hereafter much to be ſpoken of; the other two held ſome part of Illyria, about which the Romans were ſo far from contending with them, that gladly they ſought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of theſe Aſſociates, are thruſt into the Treaty; rather to give it countenance, than for any readineſs which they diſcloſe to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorymachus, and others, are yet a while the only men, of whom the Roman Generals muſt make much; as the late French King, Henry the Fourth, when he had only the title of Navarre, was ſaid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Army; made a countenance of War upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger, to infeſt the Kingdom of Macedon; waſted the Countrey about Oricum and Apollonia; and overrunning the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held ſuſpected, came down into Theſſaly, whence he made ſhew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, he thought to ſtir up all the Greeks adjoyning, againſt the Ætolians, whom they generally deteſted as a neſt of Robbers, troubleſome to all the Countrey. To which purpoſe, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, he left Perſeus, his Son and Heir, with four thouſand men, upon their borders: with the reſt of his Army, before greater buſineſs ſhould overtake and entangle him, he made a long journey into Thrace, againſt a people called the Medes: that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whenſoever the King was abſent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could againſt the Acarnanians, in hope to ſubdue thoſe their daily Enemies, and win their little Countrey, ere he ſhould be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently ſituated to let in an Army, and conſigned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the ſtout reſolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we ſay) every Mothers ſon of them, in defence of their Countrey; together with the great haſte of the Macedonian (who laid aſide all other buſineſs) to ſuccour theſe his friends; cauſed the Ætolians to forſake their Enterpriſe. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Anticyræ, which they took: the Romans aſſailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the ſpoil.

For theſe good ſervices M. Valerius was choſen Conſul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius ſent in his ſtead, to keep the War on foot in Greece. But beſides the Roman help, Attalus, out of Aſia, came over to aſſiſt the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved, by his own jealouſie of Philip's greatneſs: though ſomewhat alſo tickled with the vanity, of being choſen by the Ætolians their principal Magiſtrate; which honour, though no better than titulary, he took in very loving part. Againſt the Forces which Attalus and the Romans had ſent, being joyned with the main power of Ætolia. Philip tried the fortune of two battels: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon theſe his troubleſome Neighbours deſired peace of him; and uſed their beſt means to get it. But when the day, appointed for the concluſion thereof, was come; their Embaſſadors, inſtead of making ſubmiſſion, propoſed unto him ſuch intollerable conditions, as ill beſeemed vanquiſhed men to offer; and might therefore well teſtifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being beſieged in their own Towns, that had made them deſirous of compoſition. This fear being taken away, by the Encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever: and thruſt a Garriſon of their own, and ſome Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the ſtreight from Naupactus, waſted the Countrey in a terrible bravery: wherein Philip requited them; coming upon them in haſte from the Nemæan Games (which he was then celebrating) and ſending them faſter away, but nothing richer than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Pruſias, King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no leſs than Attalus held ſuſpected the power of Philip; ſent a Navy into Greece, to aſſiſt the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and upon greater reaſon; as being more intereſſed in the ſucceſs of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man ſome two hundred Ships; yet the Veſſels were ſuch, as could not hold out againſt the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him, to uſe the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aid came ſomewhat too late: which might better at firſt have kept thoſe Enemies from faſtning upon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could ſerve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needful that he ſhould correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principal Confederates. But in aſſailing their Town, he was encountred by the Ætolian and Roman Garriſon; which drave him back with ſome loſs.

loss. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his Retreat from Elis: rather he had given testimony of his personal Valour, in fighting well on foot, when his Horse was slain under him. He had also soon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thousand; with some twenty thousand Head of Cattel, which they had brought together into a place of safety, as they thought, when their Countrey was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his Horse running hastily under a low Tree, had torn off one of the Horns, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an Aetolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The Horn was well known, and the Tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar: and not only the Borderers, ready to fall upon the Countrey, but some Captains of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ran into such Treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home; leaving not three thousand men to assist his friends the Achæans. He also took order, to have Beacons erected, that might give him notice of the Enemies doings; upon whom he meant shortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-favouredly; especially in the Isle of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it; where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hasty Marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the City of Opus. This City, lying over-against Eubœa, Attalus had won, more through the cowardize of the People, than any great force that he had used. Now because the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much Money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philip's arrival, made him leave all behind him, and run away to the Seaside, where he got aboard his Ships; finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this misadventure; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his invasion upon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus return home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus; won Toronè, Tritones, Dryopus, and many small Towns in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more bravery than importance, against the Aetolians. In the mean season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arrival, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his Death in Ægypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conform themselves to their old manner of Government. But their Estate was so far out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the City, proved no less unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large Dominion abroad. Lycurgus, a Tyrant, rose up among them: unto whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worst than both of them. They held on the Aetolian and Roman side, for fear of the Achæans, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speak more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake brave words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to do with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made War by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where find them; such haste they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he said, was not always prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their loss. The Achaians were glad to hear these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Towns, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendred Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had been taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their own City. Further, passing over the Corinthian Gulf, he fell upon the Aetolians: whom he drave into the Mountains and Woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Countrey. This done, he took leave of the Achæans: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his Subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearless of any threatning danger. Then had he leisure to make War upon the Dardanians, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himself Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ran along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good success added much Reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make strong War upon the Aetolians, at their own doors. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates; or some fear of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall upon Italy; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Aetolians therefore, being driven to great extremity, were fain to sue for peace unto Philip, and accept it, upon whatever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand Foot, a thousand Horse, and thirty five Gallies, came over in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Aetolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise, as if with these his own Forces he would work Wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him Battel: but he refused it; and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Countrey round about, before his eyes, kept himself close within the Walls of Apollonia; making some Overtures of Peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Aetolians, as had Philip, to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royal offer that he made them, to serve their turn in Italy, and assist them in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any Fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Army, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Pyracies. Only once they came to his help, which was, at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone again before his arrival: having done nothing; and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his own Navy, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This wretchless dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hanno his Tricks; whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to hear, that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the World at his pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Envy could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian Wars so mighty a Prince, whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes, by making many promises of sending a Fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serve to terrifie the Romans, and compel them to send part of their Forces from home; that might find this Enemy work abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the War, be urged unto the prosecution by his own necessity, putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy, should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might address their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfil his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsel of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition without his advice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as far as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; even in that little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he begun the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithless promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him; with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the War, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrel were meerly his own, and he unable to manage it. The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the War, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or four Towns of Illyria, which they had recovered in this War, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inferred into the Covenants, that somewhat might seem to have been gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would seem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their loss.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias, King of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus, King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were never slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians, they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the setting down of their name in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: for as much as they were a busie people, and ministred occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble Affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their Commonweal.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halves; and wasted more Men and Money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole War, in far shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This Error had been the less harmful, if their care of Italy had been such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to weary himself with expectation of their promised Supplies: which being still deferred from year to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conqueror could have desired. The Death of Posthumius, and destruction of his whole Army in Gaule; the begun Rebellion of the Sardinians; the Death of Hiero, their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicil; as also that War, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon, happening all at one time; time; and that ſo nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among ſo many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have ſunk the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the firſt year, yet at leaſt the ſecond, ſent over to Hannibal the Forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diverſity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, adminiſtred matter unto Hanno, or ſuch as Hanno was, whereupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to perform all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when ſo many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care, and required their ſeveral Armies. This had not been a very bad excuſe, if any one of the many occaſions offered had been throughly proſecuted: though it ſtood with beſt reaſon, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the proſperity of Hannibal in his Italian War; ſhould have been ſtrengthened, whatſoever had become of the reſt. But the ſlender Troops, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the War in Spain; the lingring aid which they ſent, to uphold the Sardinian Rebellion, when it was already well near beaten down; their trifling with Philip; and (amongſt all theſe their attempts) their haſty catching at Sicil: little deſerved to be thought good reaſons of neglecting the main point, whereto all the reſt had reference. Rather every one of theſe Actions, conſidered apart by it ſelf, was no otherwiſe to be allowed as diſcreetly undertaken, or ſubſtantially followed, than by making ſuppoſition. That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elſe. Yet if theſe allegations would not ſerve to content Hannibal, then muſt he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatneſs, and durſt not truſt him with ſo much power, as ſhould enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatſoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himſelf to Neceſſity, to feed his Italian friends with hopes, and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to ſpend his Army in an hard Siege, that was to be reſerved for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola; but always with bad ſucceſs. Once Marcellus fought a Battel with him there: yet under the very Walls of the Town; having the aſſiſtance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman ſide, ſince the Heads, that inclined them to Rebellion, were cut off. About a thouſand men Hannibal in that Fight loſt: which was no great marvel; his Forces being then divided, and imployed in ſundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was, even in thoſe days, a ſtrong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earneſt deſire of Hannibal to get it, was always fruſtrate. Upon the Town of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They ſent to the chief Magiſtrates of the Cumans, deſiring them (as being alſo Campans) to be preſent at a ſolemn Sacrifice of the Nation, where they would conſult about their general good: promiſing to bring thither a ſufficient Guard, to aſſure the whole Aſſembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made ſhew to entertain; but privily ſent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus, the Roman Conſul.

Gracchus was a very good Man of War; and happily choſen Conſul in ſo dangerous a time. His Colleague ſhould have been Poſthumius Albinus, that was lately ſlain by the Gaules: after whoſe death Marcellus was choſen; as being judged the fitteſt man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found ſome religious impediment, that nullified the Election of Marcellus; or at leaſt they feigned ſo to have done: becauſe this was the firſt time that ever two Plebeian Conſuls were choſen together. Marcellus therefore gave over the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was ſubſtituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of Religion, or Superſtition: wherewith Rome was commonly, eſpecially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Conſular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemy in Field; yet intentive to all occaſions that ſhould be preſented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no ſmall part of his followers. Theſe, and the reſt of his Men, he continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skilful in the Exerciſes of War, than to keep it from quarrels, that might ariſe by upbraiding one another with their baſe condition.

Whilſt the Conſul was thus buſied at Linternum, the Senators of Cumæ ſent him word, of all that had paſſed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occaſion to fleſh his Men, and make them confident againſt the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himſelf into Cumæ; whence he iſſued at ſuch time, as the Magiſtrates of that City were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chief Magiſtrate of Capua, with fourteen thouſand Men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deviſing how to ſurpriſe others, than fearing himſelf to be aſſailed. The Conſul therefore, ſuffering none to go forth of Cumæ, that might bear word of him to the Enemies, iſſued out of the Town when it grew dark: his Men being well refreſhed with meat and ſleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights ſervice. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and ſlew more than two thouſand of them, together with their Commander; loſing not above an hundred of his own Men. Their Camp he took: but tarried not long to rifle it, for fear of Hannibal; who lay not far off. By this his providence, he eſcaped a greater loſs than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to find thoſe young Souldiers, and Slaves, buſied in making ſpoil, and loading themſelves with the booty. But they were all gotten ſafe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for deſire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal aſſailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill ſucceſs, the Carthaginians and their fellows ſpent about this Town. They raiſed a wooden Tower againſt it: which they brought cloſe unto the Walls; thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inſide of the Wall, raiſed againſt this an higher Tower: whence they made reſiſtance; and found means at length, to conſume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buſie in quenching the fire, the Romans, ſallying out of the Town at two Gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their Trenches, with the ſlaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Conſul wiſely ſounded the Retreat; ere his Men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readineſs to requite their ſervice. Neither would he, in the pride of this good ſucceſs, adventure forth againſt the Enemy; who preſented him battel the day following, near unto the Walls. Hannibal therefore, ſeeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the Siege; and returned to his old Camp at Tifata. About theſe times, and ſhortly after, when Fabius the other Conſul had taken the Field, ſome ſmall Towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people ſeverely puniſhed for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Army was too ſmall, to fill with Garriſons all places that had yielded; and withal to abide (as it muſt do) ſtrong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the ſupply from home, that ſhould enable him to ſtrike at Rome it ſelf, was driven in the mean time to alter his courſe of War: and, inſtead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invaſion upon the whole Countrey, to paſs from place to place; and wait upon occaſions, that grew daily more commodious to the Enemy than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievouſly waſted by Marcellus, in the abſence of Hannibal: as alſo was Campania, by Fabius the Conſul; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola; and received there the loſs before-mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. Theſe people ſhewed not the like ſpirit in defending their Lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the Soveraignty. They held it reaſon, that they ſhould be protected, by ſuch as thought to have Dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old the more eaſie means, to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentive, as neceſſity conſtrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Conſulſhip: and joyned with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of theſe two, Fabius was called the Shield; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon juſt reaſon, commended, That being himſelf Conſul, and holding the Election, he did not ſtand upon nice points of formality, or regard what Men might think of his ambition, but cauſed himſelf to be choſen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City ſtood of able Commanders. The great name of theſe Conſuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, ſerved to put the Campans in fear, that Capua it ſelf ſhould be beſieged. To prevent this, Hannibal at their earneſt entreaty came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum) and, having with his preſence, comforted theſe his friends, fell on the ſudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-Town of Campania; about which he ſpent three days in vain, hoping to have won it. The Garriſon in Puteoli was ſix thouſand ſtrong: and did their duty ſo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good ſucceſs, could only ſhew his anger upon the Fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill ſucceſs as before) aſſayed Nola, he bent his courſe to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilſt he was in his progreſs thither, Hanno made a journey againſt Beneventum: and T. Gracchus, the laſt years Conſul, haſting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a Battel. Hanno had with him about ſeventeen thouſand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the moſt part; beſides twelve hundred Horſe; very few of which were Italians, all the reſt, Numidians and Moors. He held the Roman work four hours, ere it could be perceived, to which ſide the Victory would incline. But Gracchus his Souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed Slaves, had received from their General a peremptory denunciation, That this day, or never, they muſt purchaſe their liberty, bring every man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The ſweet reward of liberty was ſo greatly deſired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it; howbeit that vain labour, impoſed by their General, of cutting off the ſlain Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly, and hindered the ſervice, by imployment of ſo many hands, in a work ſo little concerning the Victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own Error, wiſely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they ſhould caſt away the heads, and ſpare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all ſhould have liberty immediately after the Battel, if they wan the day. This encouragement made them run head-long upon the Enemy; whom their deſperate fury had ſoon overthrown, if the Roman Horſe could have made their part good againſt the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and preſſed ſo hard upon the Roman Battel, that four thouſand of the Slaves, (for fear either of him, or of the puniſhment which Gracchus had threatned before the Battel, unto thoſe that ſhould not valiantly behave themſelves) retired unto a ground of ſtrength: yet was he glad at length to ſave himſelf by flight, when the Groſs of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the loſs. Leaving the Field, he was accompanied by no more than two thouſand: moſt of which were Horſe; all the reſt were either ſlain or taken. The Roman General gave unto all his Souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promiſed: but unto thoſe four thouſand, which had recoiled unto the Hill, he added this light puniſhment; That as long as they ſerved in the Wars, they ſhould neither eat nor drink otherwiſe than ſtanding, unleſs ſickneſs forced them to break his Order. So the victorious Army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchiſed Souldiers were feaſted in publick by the Townſmen; ſome ſitting, ſome ſtanding, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the cuſtom of Slaves manumiſed) with Caps, or white Wool. The Picture of this Feaſt (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his Father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the firſt Battel, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had loſt ſince the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the Victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hamæ, being things of ſmall importance.

Thus the Romans through induſtry, by little and little, repaired that great breach in their Eſtate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treaſury was ſo poor, that no induſtry nor art could ſerve to help it. The Fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) ſerve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any ſurpluſage, that might be exchanged for other needful commodities. Few they were in Italy, that continued to pay them Tribute: which alſo they could worſe do than before; as living upon the ſame Trade, and ſubject to the ſame inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it ſelf. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yield yield great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the Detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now do least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased: so as if Money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be far less than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatness of the War within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the peril, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to find him work at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother over the Alpes; as soon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not Money for any one of these mortal dangers, were driven almost even to extream want of counsel. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the Letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fulvius, the Prætor, laid open the publick wants, and plainly said, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of Money for Victual, Weapons, Apparel, or the like things needful to the Souldiers: but that such as had stuff, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities, and labours, until the War were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus, the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redress of disorders within the City, were chiefly intentive to the correction of those that had mis-behaved themselves in this present War. They began with L. Cæcilius Metellus: who, after the Battel at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than lost. After him they took in hand those, that having brought to Rome the Message of their fellows made Prisoners at Cannæ, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by Oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the Wars, after the term which the Laws appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtful only in Reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto by this Decree of the Senate following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serve until the end of the War, under the same hard Conditions that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Cannæ. The Office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those, whose unhonest or unseemly behaviour fell not within compass of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publick Horses of service, unto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the over-sight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much reverenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could do) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this general Tax, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick works; as mending of High-Ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other Buildings. If any man encroached upon the streets, high-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customs, and other publick Revenues, to farm: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this Office, as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the Dignity of the Senate: the Commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were always of that Order, and careful to uphold the Reputation thereof. But the Common-weal being now impoverished by War, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Customs that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decaied places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kind; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed, in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travel, without expectation of any payment, before the end of the War. In like sort, the Masters of those Slaves, that lately had been enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, until the City were in better case to pay. In this general inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as far forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the Goods of Orphans, and of Widows living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Quæstor kept a book, of all that was laid out for the sustenance of these Widows and Orphans: whilst the whole stock was used by the City. This good Example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yielded half so much Commodity, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright, the calamities of this War did rather enable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom she forthwith undertook, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those Men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman Mettal grew more hard and solid; and by paring the Branches of private Fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Commonwealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happiness of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State whose dimension or stem is small, may aptly serve to be a foundation of a great Monarchy: which chiefly comes to pass, where all regard of domestical prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Countrey. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath seen a great Example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength, grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it self to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alva; were it so, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as by extreme industry, and straining themselves to fill their publick Treasury, they are all grown wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient Resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, above all other, the great love of the Common-weal, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the City was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautiful, should in all reason have been more dear unto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subjects of Rome, could have believed their own interest to be as great, in those Wars which their latter Emperors made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great Vertue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath given unto Man the knowledg of those ways, by which Kingdoms rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIV.

The Romans win some Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The Siege of Capua. Two Victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the Gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the War: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Town of Casilive Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Nevertheless the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the Enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted unto the best effect. So the Siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearful, and craved parley; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus, seizing upon a Gate, entred with his Army, and put all to the Sword that came in their way. Fifty of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made Prisoners. If Fabius deserved commendations, by holding his word good unto these Fifty, I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as scaped the heat of Execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himself, after the Roman fashion, with some Equivocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsan, in Gascoigne, taken by the Marshal Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parley about composition, the besieged ran all from their several Guards, upon hasty desire of being acquainted with the Conditions proposed. The Marshal therefore discovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entred by Scalade, and put all save the Governor unto the Sword. Herein that Governor of Mount Marsan committed two gross Errors; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parley, without pledges for assurance given and received. Some such over-sight the Governor of Casilive seemeth to have committed: yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable. When this work was ended, many small Towns of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slain, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum, waiting to hear from those, that had promised to give up the Town. But M. Valerius, the Roman Proprætor, had thrust so many Men into it, that the Traitors durst not stir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was fain to depart, having wearied himself in vain with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrey; but contented himself with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and began to victual it, when Summer was but half past. It is said, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town: in which regard if he began his Winter more timely, than otherwise need required, he did not like the Romans; whom ne-neceſſity enforced, to make their Summer laſt as long, as they were able to travel up and down the Countrey.

About this time began great troubles in Sicil; whither Marcellus the Conſul was ſent, to take ſuch order for the Province, as need ſhould require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Conſulſhip, we will ſpeak hereafter.

The new Conſuls, choſen at Rome, were Q. Fabius, the Son of the preſent Conſul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time. The Romans found it needful for the publick ſervice, to imploy oftentimes their beſt able men: and therefore made it lawful, during the War, to recontinue their Officers, and chooſe ſuch, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any diſtance of time, which was otherwiſe required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his Son: which was perhaps the reſpect, that moſt commended his Son unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his Son rode forth to meet him: Eleven of the Twelve Lictors, which carried each an Axe, with a bundle of Rods before the Conſul, ſuffered him, in regard of due reverence, to paſs by them on horſe-back; which was againſt the cuſtom. But the Son perceiving this, commanded the laſt of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bad the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conſul on his Feet. The Father chearfully did ſo, ſaying, It was my mind, Son, to make trial, whether thou didſt underſtand thy ſelf to be Conſul. Caſſius Altinius, a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the Battel at Cannæ, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, ſeeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conſul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conſul purpoſed to follow old Examples: and to make this Altinius a pattern to all Traitors; uſing him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done thoſe, that offered their unfaithful ſervice againſt the Faliſci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius, the Father, was of another opinion: and ſaid, it was a matter of dangerous conſequence, That it ſhould be thought more ſafe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he ſhould be ſent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as Priſoner, until they could better reſolve what to do with him, or what uſe to make of him. Hannibal, underſtanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, took it not ſorrowfully; but thought this a good occaſion, to ſeize upon all the Mans Riches, which were great. Yet, that he might ſeem rather ſevere, than covetous, he ſent for the Wife and Children of Altinius into his Camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intention of this fugitive, partly, and more ſtrictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them, as partakers of the Treaſon, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himſelf. Fabius, the Conſul, ſhortly after came to Arpi: which he wan by Scalado, in a ſtormy and rainy night. Five thouſand of Hannibal's Souldiers lay in the Town; and of the Arpines themſelves, there were about three thouſand. Theſe were thruſt formoſt by the Carthaginian Garriſon, when it was underſtood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the Townſmen ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſdom, to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: proteſting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become ſubject to the Carthaginians, againſt their wills. In proceſs of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Prætor went unto the Roman Conſul: and receiving his faith for ſecurity of the Town, preſently made head againſt the Garriſon. This notwithſtanding, like it is, that Hannibal's men continued to make good reſiſtance. For when almoſt a thouſand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their Companions, and ſerve on the Roman ſide, it was yet covenanted, That the Carthaginians ſhould be ſuffered to paſs forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and ſo Arpi became Roman again, with little other loſs, than of him that had betrayed it. About the ſame time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Prætors: and unto Cneius Fulvius, another of the Prætors, an hundred and twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their ſervice, upon no other condition, than to have their goods reſtored unto them, when their City ſhould be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of ſmall importance: but conſidering the general hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it ſerved to diſcover the inclination of the Italians in thoſe times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of thoſe mighty ſuccours, that had been promiſed from Carthage. The Conſentines alſo, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yeilded themſelves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their Example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican, had made himſelf a Captain, and gotten Reputation by ſome petty Exploits in forraging the Countrey, was ſlain by Hanno, with a great multitude of thoſe that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it ſeemed that it would ſtand him in good ſtead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to ſend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his deſire to paſs: and being loth to hazard his Forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence, he contented himſelf, with taking in ſome poor Towns of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accompliſh their purpoſe, and his wiſh. One Phileas, that was of their Conſpiracy, who lay at Rome, as Embaſſador, practiſing with the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, and ſuch as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his Company were the next day ſo cloſely purſued, that all of them were taken and brought back to Rome; where they ſuffered death, as Traitors. By reaſon of this cruelty, or ſeverity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earneſtly than before. As for the Conſpirators, they followed their buſineſs the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention ſhould happen to be diſcovered. Wherefore they ſent again to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their Plot, made the ſame compoſition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chief among them, uſed much to go forth of the Town on hunting by night, as if they durſt not take their pleaſure by day, for for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldom or never they miſſed of their Game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not ſeem to have been abroad upon other occaſion. From the Camp of Hannibal, it was about three days journey to Tarentum, if he ſhould have marched thither with his whole Army. This cauſed his long abode in one place the leſs to be ſuſpected: as alſo to make his Enemies the more ſecure, he cauſed it to be given out, that he was ſick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careleſs of ſuch his Neighbourhood, and the Conſpirators had ſet their buſineſs in order, he took with him ten thouſand the moſt expedite of his Horſe and Foot, and long before break of day, made all ſpeed thitherward. Fourſcore light Horſe of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the ways, and killing any that they met, for fear leſt he, and his Troop following him, ſhould be diſcovered. It had been often the manner of ſome few Numidian Horſe, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the Evening, that ſome Numidians were abroad in the Fields, took it for a ſign, that Hannibal was not as yet diſlodged; and gave order, that ſome Companies ſhould be ſent out the next morning, to ſtrip them of their Booty, and ſend them gone. But when it grew dark night, Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came cloſe to the Town: where, according to the Tokens agreed upon, making a light to ſhew his arrival; Nico, that was within the Town, anſwered him with another light, in ſign that he was ready. Preſently Nico began to ſet upon one of the Gates, and to kill the Watchmen. Philomenes went toward another Gate: and whiſtling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make haſte, for that he had killed a great Boar, ſo heavy, that ſcarce two men could ſtand under it. So the Porter opened the Wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Boar; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter ſtood wondring at the largeneſs of the Beaſt, Philomenes ran him through with his Boar-Spear: and letting in ſome thirty armed men, fell upon all the Watch; whom when he had ſlain, he opened the great Gate. So the Army of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were diſtributed by their General, and ſent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their Guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conſpirators, that when any of their friends appeared in ſight, they ſhould bid him be quiet, and of good chear. All the Town was in an uproar; but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman Trumpet was unskilfully ſounded by a Greek in the Theatre; which helped the ſuſpition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to ſpoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governor fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadel, that ſtood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might eaſily perceive the next morning, how all had paſſed. Hannibal, aſſembling the Tarentines, gave them to underſtand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly againſt the Romans, as tyrannous oppreſſors; and ſpake what elſe he thought fit for the preſent. This done: and having gotten ſuch ſpoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addreſſed himſelf againſt the Citadel: hoping that if the Garriſon would ſally out, he might give them ſuch a blow, as ſhould make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery ſallying forth, gave charge upon his Men: who fell back of purpoſe, according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and ſo far from their ſtrength, as they durſt adventure. Then gave Hannibal a ſign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpoſe: and fiercely ſetting upon the Enemy, drave him back with great ſlaughter, as faſt as he could run; ſo that afterwards he durſt not iſſue forth. The Citadel ſtood upon a Demi-Iſland, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall againſt the Town, whereunto it was joyned by a Cawſey. This Cawſey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like ſort againſt the Citadel; to the end, that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themſelves from all danger thence. His work in few days went ſo well forward, without impediment from the beſieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Piece it ſelf, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all ſorts of Engines, to force the place. But whilſt he was buſied in his Works, there came by Sea a ſtrong ſupply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counſel. Now foraſmuch as the Tarentine Fleet lay within the Haven, and could not paſs forth, whilſt the Romans held the Citadel: it ſeemed likely, that the Town would ſuffer want, being debarred of accuſtomed Trade and Proviſions by Sea; whilſt the Roman Garriſon, by help of their Shipping, might eaſily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Againſt this inconvenience, it was rather wiſhed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their Fleet could get out of the Haven, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all ſupply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town ſtanding in plain ground, and their ſtreets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertook and effected: whereby the Roman Garriſon was reduced into great neceſſity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwiſe buſied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutual loſs on both ſides, the time paſſed: and the Roman Forces, growing daily ſtronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately choſen Conſuls, prepared to beſiege the great City of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and haſty growth from that want of men, and of all neceſſaries, whereinto the loſs at Cannæ had reduced them. But to fill up theſe Legions, they were fain to take up young Boys, that were under ſeventeen years of age: and to ſend Commiſſioners above fifty miles round, for the ſeeking out of ſuch Lads as might appear ſerviceable, and preſſing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of ſervice whereunto they were bound by order of the City, ſhould be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning ſo young, as if they had been of lawful age. Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campans felt great want of Victuals, as if they had already been beſieged. This happened partly by ſloath of the Nation, partly by the great waſte and ſpoil, which the Romans had in foregoing years made upon their grounds. They ſent therefore Embaſſadors to Hannibal; deſiring him to ſuccour them ere they were cloſed up, as they feared to be ſhortly. He gave them comfortable words; and ſent Hanno with an Army to ſupply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, againſt which they ſhould be ready with all manner of Carriages, to ſtore themſelves with Victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promiſe more than he performed. For he cauſed great quantity of Grain, that had been layed up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than forty Carts or Waggons, with a few Pack-horſes; as if this had been enough to victual Capua. Such was the wretchleſsneſs of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them, they were worſe than very Beaſts, ſince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day, againſt which he made proviſion to ſtore them throughly. Of all theſe doings word was ſent to the Roman Conſuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius, the Conſul, taking with him ſuch ſtrength as he thought needful for the ſervice, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made enquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno, with part of his Army, was gone abroad to make proviſions; that ſome two thouſand Waggons, with a great rabble of Carters, and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their Camp; ſo that little good order was kept; all thought being ſet upon a great Harveſt. Hereupon the Conſul bad his Men prepare themſelves, to aſſail the Enemies Camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward ſo early in the morning, that he was there with the firſt break of day. By coming ſo unexpected, he had well-near forced the Camp on the ſudden. But it was very ſtrong, and very well defended: ſo that the longer the Fight continued, the leſs deſire had Fulvius to loſe more of his Men in the Attempt; ſeeing many of them caſt away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he ſaid, that it were better to go more leiſurely and ſubſtantially to work; to ſend for his fellow-Conſul, with the reſt of their Army, and to lie between Hanno and home; that neither the Campans ſhould depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieve them. Being thus diſcourſing, and about to ſound the Retreat, he ſaw, that ſome of his Men had gotten over the Enemies Rampart. There was great booty; or (which was all one to the Souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore ſome Enſign-bearers threw their Enſigns over the Rampart, willing their Men to fetch them out, unleſs they would endure the ſhame and diſhonour following ſuch a loſs. Fear of ſuch ignominy, than which none could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure ſo deſparately, that Fabius, perceiving the heat of his Men, changed purpoſe, and encouraged thoſe that were ſomewhat backward, to follow the Example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Camp was won: in which were ſlain above ſix thouſand; and taken, above ſeven thouſand; beſides all the ſtore of Victuals, and Carriages, with abundance of Booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This miſadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Conſuls, made them of Capua ſend a pitiful Embaſſage to Hannibal: putting him in mind of all the love that he was wont to proteſt unto their City; and how he had made ſhew, to affect it no leſs than Carthage. But now, they ſaid, it would be loſt, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not ſtrong and ſpeedy ſuccour. Hannibal anſwered with comfortable words; and ſent away two thouſand Horſe, to keep their grounds from ſpoil; whilſt he himſelf was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadel, partly by the diſpoſition, which he ſaw in many Towns adjoyning, to yield unto him. Among the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and, being over-taken, ſuffered Death for their attempt; were ſome of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eaſtern part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Græcia. Theſe people took to heart the Death of their Hoſtages; and thought the puniſhment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as ſoon as the Roman Garriſon was taken from them, to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their Gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, upon the like reaſon; had not ſome Companies lain in their Town; which they feared that they ſhould not be able to maſter. Nevertheleſs they helped themſelves by cunning: inviting to their Gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: againſt whom whilſt they proffered their ſervice to Atinius, the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight; and recoiling from him, cloſed up their Gates. A little formality they uſed, in pretending fear, leſt the Enemy ſhould break in together with the Romans; in ſaving Atinius himſelf, and ſending him away by Sea; as alſo in conſulting a ſmall while (becauſe perhaps many of their chief Men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they ſhould yield to the Carthaginian, or no. But this Diſputation laſted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, eaſily prevailed in the reſt; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good ſucceſs, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in thoſe quarters; whilſt the Conſuls, fortifying Beneventum, to ſecure their backs, addreſſed themſelves unto the Siege of Capua.

Many diſaſters befel the Romans, in the beginning of this great Enterpriſe. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Conſul, was ſlain either by treachery of ſome Lucans, that drew him into an Ambuſh; or by ſome Carthaginian ſtraglers, among whom he fell unawares. His Body, or his Head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himſelf, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal ſent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to ſecure the back of the Army that ſhould beſiege Capua. But his Death happened in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that buſineſs. The Volones, or Slaves lately manumiſed, forſook their Enſigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been diſcharged by the deceaſe of their Leader: ſo that it asked ſome labour to ſeek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheleſs the Conſuls went forward with their work: and drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hoſtility which they could. Mago, the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gave them an hard welcom; wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were loſt. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Conſuls, ſuls, and had the better; inſomuch, that he cauſed them to diſlodg. They removed by night, and went ſeveral ways: Fulvius toward Cumæ; Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compaſs about, and returned to Capua. It ſo fell out, that one M. Centenius Penula, a ſtout man, and one that with good commendations had diſcharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal reſted, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be truſted with the leading of five thouſand men. The Fathers were unwilling in ſuch a time, to reject the Vertue of any good Souldier, how mean ſoever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thouſand: and he himſelf, being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up ſo many Voluntaries, as almoſt doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a ſtout Centurion, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) ſlain, ſcarce a thouſand of them eſcaping. Soon after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, with eighteen thouſand Men, was in Apulia, very careleſs, and a man inſufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore haſted, to viſit him: hoping to deal the better with the main ſtrength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he ſhould have cut off thoſe Forces, that lay in the Provinces about under Men of ſmall ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his Men ſo jolly, that needs they would have fought the firſt night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he beſtowed Mago, with three thouſand of his lighteſt armed, in places thereabout moſt fit for ambuſh. Then offering battel to Fulvius, he ſoon had him in the Trap: whence he made him glad to eſcape alive; leaving all, ſave two thouſand of his followers dead behind him.

Theſe two great blows, received one preſently after the other, much aſtoniſhed the Romans. Nevertheleſs all care was taken, to gather up the ſmall reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Conſuls ſhould go ſubſtantially forwards with the Siege of Capua; which was of great conſequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other reſpects. The two Conſuls ſate down before the Town: and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Sueſſula to their aſſiſtance. They made Proclamation, That whoſoever would iſſue forth of Capua before a certain day prefixed, ſhould have his pardon, and be ſuffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being paſt, there ſhould be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliouſly rejected; the Capuans relying on their own ſtrength, and the ſuccours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was cloſed up, they ſent Meſſengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brunduſium. He had made a long journey, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadel: of which Expectation failing, he turned to Brunduſium, upon advertiſement that he ſhould be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earneſt words; and were with words as brave re-comforted. He bad them conſider, how a few days ſince he had chaſed the Conſuls out of their Fields; and told them, that we would preſently come thither again, and ſend the Romans going, as faſt as before. With this good anſwer the Meſſengers returned: and hardly could get back into the City, which the Romans had almoſt entrenched round. As for Hannibal himſelf, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendſhip, would hold out a long time: and thereby give him leiſure, to do what he thought requiſite among the Tarentines, and in thoſe Eaſtern parts of Italy; whilſt the Roman Army ſpent it ſelf in a tedious Siege. Thus he lingred: and thereby gave the Conſuls time, both to fortifie themſelves at Capua, and to diſpatch the Election of new Magiſtrates in Rome, whilſt he himſelf purſued hopes, that never found ſucceſs.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their term of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the Siege at Capua; retaining the ſame Armies, as Proconſuls. The Townſmen often ſallied out: rather in a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying cloſe within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to ſubdue them by famine. Yet againſt the Campan Horſe (for their Foot was eaſily beaten) the Romans uſed to thruſt out ſome Troops, that ſhould hold them skirmiſh. In theſe Exerciſes the Campans uſually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who ſcorned to take foil at the hands of ſuch Rebels. It was therefore deviſed, that ſome active and couragious young men, ſhould learn to ride behind the Roman Men at Arms; leaping up, and again diſmounting lightly, as occaſion ſerved. Theſe were furniſhed like the Velites, having each of them three or four ſmall Darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they diſcharged thick upon the Enemies Horſe; whom vanquiſhing in this kind of ſervice, they much diſheartned in the main. The time thus paſſing, and famine daily increaſing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the ſame time the Capuans iſſued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deviſe: ſetting all their multitude of unſerviceable people on the Walls; which, with a loud noiſe of Pans and Baſons, troubled thoſe that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius oppoſing himſelf to the Campans, eaſily defended his Trenches againſt them; and ſo well repreſſed them, that he drave them at length back into their City. Nevertheleſs, in purſuing them to their Gates, he received a Wound, that accompanied him in ſhort ſpace after to his Grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his task, by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman Camp was even at point to have been loſt: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirty, were either gotten within the Rampart, or elſe (for the report varies) being ſome of them ſlain upon it, fell into the Ditch; and filled it up in ſuch ſort, that their bodies ſerved as a bridge unto the Aſſailants. It is ſaid, that Hannibal in this Tumult cauſed ſome Fugitives, that could ſpeak Latin well, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Conſul's name, That every one of the Souldiers ſhould ſhift for himſelf, and fly betimes unto the next Hills, foraſmuch as the Camp was already loſt. But all would not ſerve. The fraud was detected: and the Army, having ſitten there ſo long, had at good leiſure ſtrongly intrenched it ſelf; ſo as little hope there was to raiſe the Siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchaſe of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it ſelf: and now his deſire of winning the Tarentine Citadel, had well near loſt Capua; in reſpect of which, neither the Citadel, nor City of Tarentum, were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a deſperate anger with himſelf and his hard fortune, that of ſo many great Victories he had made no greater uſe: on the ſudden he entertained an haughty reſolution, even to ſet upon Rome; and carry to the Walls of that proud City, the danger of War that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a mean, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at leaſt, unto the defence of their own home. If they roſe from the Siege with their whole Army, then had he his deſire: If they divided their Forces, then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, ſhould well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he deſpair that the terror of his coming might ſo aſtoniſh the Multitude within Rome, as he might enter ſome part or other of the City. His only fear was, leſt the Campans, being ignorant of his purpoſe, ſhould think he had forſaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themſelves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he ſent Letters to Capua by a ſubtle Numidian: who running as a Fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himſelf thence over the innermoſt Trenches into the City. The journey to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no ſmall hope of good ſucceſs, reſting in the ſuddenneſs of his arrival there. Wherefore he cauſed his Men, to have in a readineſs ten days Victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night tranſport his Army over the River of Vulturnus. This could not be done ſo cloſely, but that the Roman Generals, by ſome Fugitives, had notice of his purpoſe. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate: which was therewith affected, according to the diverſity of mens opinions, in a caſe of ſuch importance. Some gave counſel to let alone Capua, yea, and all places elſe, rather than to put the Town of Rome into peril of being taken by the Enemy. Others were ſo far from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, ſhould judg himſelf ſtrong enough to win Rome; and therefore ſtoutly ſaid, That thoſe Legions which were kept at home for defence of the City, would ſerve the turn well enough, to keep him out, and ſend him thence, if he were ſo unwiſe as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters ſhould be ſent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the Forces that at the preſent were in Rome: who ſince they knew beſt, what the ſtrength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were beſt able to judg, what was needful to oppoſe him. So it was referred unto the diſcretion of theſe Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoveful: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raiſe their Siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fifteen thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, the choice of his whole Army: with which he haſted toward Rome, leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reaſon of his wound, to continue the Siege at Capua.

Hannibal, having paſſed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boats; and left nothing that might ſerve to tranſport the Enemy, in caſe he ſhould offer to purſue or coaſt him. Then haſted he away toward Rome; ſtaying no longer in any one place than he needs muſt. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down, by the people of Frezellæ: which as it ſtopped him a little on his way; ſo it made him the more grievouſly to ſpoil their Lands, whilſt the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waſte he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all ſorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The Meſſengers of theſe news came apace, one after another, into the City; ſome few bringing true advertiſements; but the moſt of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the ſtreets, and Temples in Rome, were peſtered with Women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their Hair, becauſe they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Aſſembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magiſtrates. All places of moſt importance were ſtuffed with Souldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midſt of this Trepidation, there came news, that Q. Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was haſting to defence of the City. The Office of a Proconſul did expire, at his return home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might loſe nothing by coming into the City in time of ſuch need, an Act was paſſed, That he ſhould have equal power with the Conſuls, during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one ſoon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in paſſing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Countrey was able to give. The Conſuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; ſo took they more careful and eſpecial order, againſt all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Town: whence he advanced with two thouſand Horſe, and rode along a great way under the Walls; viewing the ſite thereof, and conſidering how he might beſt approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story ſaith) was driven away, without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many Tumults roſe in this while among the people; but were ſuppreſſed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the reſt, one accident was both troubleſome, and not without peril. Of Numidians that had ſhifted ſide, and fallen (upon ſome diſpleaſures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were ſome twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Conſuls, to paſs through the Town, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their ſervice might be uſeful, among broken ways, and Garden-walls lying in the Suburbs. The faces of theſe men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred ſuch miſtaking, as cauſed a great uproar among the people: all crying out, that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the Walls. The noiſe was ſuch, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the ſtreets were ſo full of Cattel, and Husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoyning, that the passage was stopt up; and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the house-tops, with stones and other Weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate Multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had been Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should have Authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following, Hannibal passed over Anien, and presented Battel to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertook it. It is said, that a terrible shower of Rain, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their several Camps: and that this happened two days together, the weather breaking up, and clearing, as soon as they were departed asunder. Certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten days provision, could not endure to stay there, until his Victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well-advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibal's coming to the City, how great soever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of his Forces, which appeared less than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soon abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spain, after the Death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the Town, and went forth at one Gate, whilst the Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatness of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy, to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men have fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his Souldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him, that could tell who had sent the Ass into the Camp. But in this present Example of the Romans, appears withal a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no less, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seem to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their Enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that fear, which clouded their Valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignity coming to his ear, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made Port-sale of the Silver-smiths Shops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own Title to the Houses within the Town, were no whit worse than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counterpractice was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceived; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His Victuals were almost spent: and of those ends that he had proposed unto himself, this journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what spoil he could in the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein Wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a Tempest over the Countrey; and ran toward the Eastern Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the City of Rhegium before his arrival was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that fair City, since he had no other way to vent his grief.

Q. Fulvius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation a-new, that whoso would yeild, before a certain day, might safely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman Pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his own evil deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given by Hanno and Bostar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again, if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as Fugitives, out of the Town, into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their Packets. But it hapned, ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno, were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make War against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions whereſoever they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those Victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their Enemies, by turning an other way; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view: promising, to make a desperate Sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow. But Hannibal had already done his best: and now began to faint under the burden of that War, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remedileſs necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands Liv. l. 30.

hands of all ſuch counterfeit Fugitives, as carried ſuch Meſſages, whipt them back into the Town. This miſerable ſpectacle break the hearts of the Campans: ſo that the Multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, cauſed them to aſſemble, and conſult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The braveſt of the Senators, and ſuch as a few years ſince had been moſt forward in joyning with Hannibal, underſtood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the reſt home to ſupper: telling them, that when they had made good chear, he would drink to them ſuch an Health, as ſhould ſet them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemy ſought upon their bodies. About ſeven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking Poyſon. All the reſt, hoping for more mercy than they had deſerved, yielded ſimply to diſcretion. So one of the Town-gates was ſet open: whereat a Roman Legion, with ſome other Companies, entring, diſarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garriſon; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconſuls laid Irons upon them all: and commanding them to tell what ſtore of Gold and Silver they had at home, ſent them into ſafe cuſtody; ſome to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general Multitude; they were reſerved unto the diſcretion of the Senate: yet ſo hardly uſed by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cauſe of hope or comfort in this adverſity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of Death, by the Wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his Daughter in Marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we ſpake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more haſty in taking vengeance: for fear, leſt, upon the like reſpects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoveful to the common ſafety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the pains, to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he cauſed all the Campan Priſoners to ſuffer Death; binding them to ſtakes, and ſcourging them firſt a good while with rods; after which he ſtruck off their heads.

This terrible Example of Vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the leſs apt to follow the vain hope of the Campans: and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman ſide. The Atellans, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made alſo now the like ſubmiſſion, for very fear, and want of ability to reſiſt. They were therefore uſed with the like rigor, by Fulvius: who dealt ſo extremely with them all, that he brought them into deſperation. Wherefore ſome of their young Gentlemen, burning with fire of revenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to ſet on fire ſo many houſes, that a great part of the City was like to have been conſumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no caſualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any Slave, and other ſufficient reward unto any Freeman, that ſhould diſcover who thoſe Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campans, being detected by a Slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promiſed, was given about the ſum of an hundred Marks) had the puniſhment anſwerable to their deſerts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incenſed againſt this wretched people, held them in a manner as Priſoners within their Walls: and this extreme ſeverity cauſed them at length to become Suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that ſome period might be ſet unto their miſeries. That whereupon the Senators reſolved in the end, was worſe than all that which they had ſuffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an Harlot) were found not guilty of the late Rebellion. The reſt were, ſome of them, with their Wives and Children, ſold for Slaves; and their Goods confiſcated; others laid in Priſon, and reſerved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day; and confined unto ſeveral places, as beſt liked the angry Victors. As for the Town of Capua, it was ſuffered to ſtand, in regard of the beauty and commodious ſite: but no Corporation, or form of polity, was allowed to be therein: only a Roman Proveſt was every year ſent, to govern over thoſe that ſhould inhabit it, and to do juſtice. This was the greateſt act, and moſt important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great loſſes in the preſent War. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to ſhine with a more dim light than before: his Oil being far ſpent; and that which ſhould have revived his flame, being unfortunately ſhed; as ſhall be told in place convenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia, and Sicil, held War againſt the Romans in thoſe Iſlands; and were overcome.

WHilſt things paſſed thus in Italy, the Commotions raiſed in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end, by the induſtrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian Rebellion was great and ſudden: above thirty thouſand being up in Arms, ere the Roman Forces could arrive there to ſuppreſs it. One Harſicoras, with his Son Hioſtus, mighty men in that Iſland, were the Ringleaders; being incited by Hanno, a Carthaginian, that promiſed the aſſiſtance of his Countrey. Neither were the Carthaginians in this Enterpriſe ſo careleſs, as in the reſt of their main undertakings, about the ſame time. Yet it had been better, if their care had been directed unto the proſecution of that main buſineſs in Italy; whereon this, and all other hopes depended. For it would have ſufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from ſending an Army into Sardinia. Harſicoras, with his followers, might well enough have ſerved to drive out Q. Mutius, the Prætor; who lay ſick in the Province; and not more weak in his own Body, than in his Train. But whilſt they ſought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the ſenſe was moſt grievous: they neglected the opportunity of requiting thoſe that had done them wrong, and of the ſecuring themſelves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune alſo in this Enterpriſe was ſuch, as may ſeem to have diſcouraged them from being at the like charge, in caſes of more importance. For whereas they ſent over Aſdrubal, ſurnamed the bald, with a competent Fleet and Army; aſſiſted in this Expedition by Hanno, the Author of the Rebellion, and by Mago, a Gentleman of the Barchine houſe, and near Kinſman to Hannibal: it ſo fell out, that the whole Fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was caſt upon the Baleares; ſo beaten, and in ſuch evil plight, that the Sardinians had even ſpent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquiſhed, ere theſe their friends could arrive to ſuccour them.

Titus Manlius was ſent from Rome with two and twenty thouſand Foot, and twelve hundred Horſe, to ſettle the eſtate of that Iſland, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Conſulſhip. It was a laudable cuſtom of the Romans, to preſerve and uphold in their ſeveral Provinces, the greatneſs and reputation of thoſe men, and their families, by whom each Province had been firſt ſubdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatſoever accident required the aſſiſtance of a Patron: the firſt Conqueror, and his Race after him, were the moſt ready and beſt approved means, to procure the benefit of the people ſubdued. Hereby the Romans held very ſure intelligence in every Province, and had always in readineſs fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any ſuch diſorder, as would otherwiſe have required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harſicoras ſo ſtrong in Field, that Manlius was compelled to arm his Marriners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thouſand, whereof we have ſpoken before: He landed at Calaris, or Carallis: where mooring his Ships, he paſſed up into the Countrey, and ſought out the Enemy. Hyoſtus, the Son of Harſicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his Father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their ſide. This young Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battel to the Romans at his own diſcretion. So he raſhly adventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and loſt in one day above thirty thouſand of his followers. Hyoſtus himſelf, with the reſt of his broken Troops, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Iſland: whither Manlius purſued them. Very ſoon after this deſeature came Aſdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to win all Sardinia, in ſuch haſte as he might have done, if the Tempeſt had not hindred his Voyage; yet ſoon enough, and ſtrong enough to ſave the Town of Cornus, and to put a new ſpirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himſelf back to Calaris: where he had not ſtayed long, ere the Sardinians (ſuch of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his aſſiſtance; their Countrey being waſted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refuſed to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had ſtayed a little longer, Aſdrubal would have fought him out with ſome blemiſh to his Reputation. But the fame of Aſdrubal and his Company, appears to have been greater than was their ſtrength. For after ſome trial made of them in a few skirmiſhes, Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battel: wherein he ſlew twelve thouſand of the Enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thouſand. Four hours the Battel laſted: and Victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Iſlanders; whoſe courages had been broken in their unproſperous fight not many days before. The Death of young Hyoſtus, and of his Father Harſicoras, that ſlew himſelf for grief, together with the Captivity of Aſdrubal himſelf, with Mago and Hanno, the Carthaginians; made the Victory the more famous. The vanquiſhed Army fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in ſhort ſpace wan the Town. All other Cities of the Iſle that had rebelled, followed the Example of Cornus, and yielded unto the Roman: who impoſing upon them ſuch increaſe of tribute, or other puniſhment, as beſt ſorted with the nature of their ſeveral offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome; leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The War in Sicil was of greater length, and every way more burdenſome to Rome: as alſo the Victory brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only ſavers of their own, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the City and Dominion of Syracuſe, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the Battel of Cannæ, the old King of Syracuſe died: who had continued long a ſtedfaſt friend unto the Romans; and greatly relieved them in this preſent War. He left his Kingdom to Hieronymus, his Grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo, his Son, that ſhould have been his Heir, being dead before. To this young King his Succeſſor, Hiero appointed Fifteen Tutors; of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themiſtius; who had married his Daughters, or the Daughters of Gelo. The reſt were ſuch, as he judged moſt likely to preſerve the Kingdom, by the ſame art, whereby himſelf had gotten, and ſo long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus, waxing weary of ſo many Coadjutors, began to commend the ſufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and ſaid, that he was able to rule the Kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he cauſed others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to paſs in a ſort as he deſired. For Hieronymus, laying aſide all care of government, gave himſelf wholly over to his pleaſures: or if he had any regard of his Royal Dignity, it was only in matter of exterior ſhew, as wearing a Diadem with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed Guard. Hereby he offended the Eyes of his People, that had never ſeen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo, his Son. But much more he offended them, when by his inſolent behaviour, ſuitable to his outward pomp, he gave proof, that, in courſe of life, he would revive the Memory of Tyrants dead long ſince, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, luſtful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him: ſo that ſuch of his late Tutors as could eſcape him by flight, were glad to live in baniſhment: the reſt, being moſt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his diſpleaſure, that ſeemed worſe than Death it ſelf. Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraſo, continued in grace with him, and were his Counſellers, but not of his Cabinet. Theſe, howſoever they agreed in other points, were at ſome diſſenſion about that main point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleaſures, which was ſet on change: but Thraſo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earearneſt to continue the amity with Rome. Whilſt as yet it remained ſomewhat doubtful, which way the King would incline; a Conſpiracy againſt his Perſon, was detected by a Groom of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would ſpeak any thing: but yielding (as it ſeemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture; he confeſſed, that he had been ſet on by Thraſo; whom he appeached of the Treaſon, together with many more, that were near in love or place unto Hieronymus. All theſe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conſpirators, walked boldly in the ſtreets, and never ſhrunk for the matter: aſſuring themſelves, that the reſolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all eſcaped, and ſoon after found means to execute their purpoſe. The King himſelf, when Thraſo was taken out of the way, quickly reſolved upon ſiding with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when firſt they grow Maſters of themſelves, love to ſeem wiſer than their Fathers, by taking different courſes. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceſſity, had of late been ſuch, as might have been termed exceſſive, were it not in regard of his Providence; wherein he took order for his own eſtate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heed of dangers far off, regarded only the things preſent; the weakneſs of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much Money that his Grand-father had laid out in vain, to ſhoulder up a falling houſe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correſpondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians born, but grandchildren of a baniſhed Syracuſian. Theſe grew into ſuch favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they lifted. So that when Appius Claudius, the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the People of Rome and the King of Syracuſe; his Meſſengers were diſmiſſed with an open ſcoff. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him, the order of the Fight at Cannæ: that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himſelf: ſaying, That he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; ſo wonderful was the Victory as they reported it. Having thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadors to Carthage, where he concluded a League: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould reign over all Sicil; and the Carthaginians reſt ſatisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At theſe doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly ſtir: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans, to entertain more quarrels than were enforced upon them by neceſſity; and partly (as may ſeem) for that the reputation, both of himſelf, and of his City, had received ſuch blemiſh, by that which hapned unto him in his journey, as much diſcountenanced him when he came into Sicil, and forbad him to look big. The Money that Hiero had beſtowed upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their neceſſity, this Appius was to carry back unto him: it being refuſed by the Roman Senate, with greater bravery than their preſent fortune would allow. But inſtead of returning the Money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noiſed abroad that he ſhould do: the War againſt Philip, King of Macedon (whereof we have ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide their vain glory, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſign that Money over to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe Voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwiſe wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family, is taxed with pride) his Errand was changed, from a glorious oſtentation of the Roman Magnanimity; into ſuch a pitiful tune of thankſgiving, as muſt needs have bred ſorrow and commiſeration, in ſo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of paſtime and ſcorn, in Hieronymus, the new King.

But whilſt Hieronymus was more deſirous of War, than well reſolved how to begin it: his own Death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the ſtate of Syracuſe; which thereby might have proſpered more than ever, had it been wiſely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we ſpake before, were ſent about the Countrey with two thouſand men, to ſolicite the Towns, and perſwade them to ſhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himſelf, with an Army of fifteen thouſand Horſe and Foot, went to Leontium, a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Iſland fall to him in all haſte, and accept him for Soveraign. There the Conſpirators took him on the ſudden, as he was paſſing through a narrow ſtreet; and ruſhing between him and his Guard, ſtruck him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the ſound of that word ſo joyfully anſwered by the Leontines, that the Guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Maſters Death. Yet for fear of the worſt, a great largeſs was promiſed unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought ſo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army, as in deteſtation of his bad life, ſuffered his Carkaſs to lie unburied. Theſe news ran quickly to Syracuſe: whither ſome of the Conſpirators, taking the Kings Horſes, poſted away, to ſignifie all that had paſſed; to ſtir up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellows, would make offer to uſurp a Tyranny. The Syracuſians hereupon preſently took Arms, and made themſelves Maſters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other ſide fortified the Palace, and the Iſland; being yet uncertain what to do; between deſire of making himſelf a Soveraign Lord, and fear of ſuffering puniſhment, as a Tyrant, if his Enterpriſe miſcarried. His Wife Demarata, that was the Daughter of Hiero, cheriſhed him in his hopes: putting him in mind of that well known Proverb, which Dionyſius had uſed; That a Tyrant ſhould keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on Horſe-back. But fear, and better counſel prevailed ſo far, that Andronodorus, having ſlept upon the matter, diſſembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a ſpeech unto the People: telling them, That he was glad to ſee, how prudently they behaved themſelves in ſo great a change; that he had ſtood in fear, leſt they would not have contained themſelves within bounds of diſcretion; but rather have ſought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that

ſince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to raviſh their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his ſtrength, and ſurrendred up the charge, committed unto him, by one that had been an evil Maſter, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors choſen (as in former times) to govern the City; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But ſuch was his deſire of Soveraignty: and ſo vehement were the inſtigations of his Wife; that ſhortly he began to practice with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercinaries: hoping to make himſelf ſtrong, by their help, that were leaſt pleaſed with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides, had been with the Syracuſian Prætors, and told them, that, being ſent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to inſtructions of their Captain, had done him, whilſt he lived, what ſervice they could; and that now they were deſirous to return home. They requeſted therefore that they might be friendly diſmiſſed: and with a Convoy, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and ſet them ſafe at Locri. This was eaſily granted; both for that the Syracuſian Magiſtrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with ſuch a little courteſie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troubleſome couple; which were good Souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwiſe lewd men. It was not the deſire of theſe two Sicilians, to be gone ſo haſtily as they made ſhew: they were more mindful of the buſineſs, for which Hannibal had ſent them. Wherefore they inſinuated themſelves into the boſoms of ſuch as were moſt likely to fill the Army with tumult: eſpecially of the Roman Fugitives, and thoſe that had cauſe to miſtruſt what ſhould become of themſelves, when the Romans and Syracuſians were come to agreement. Such inſtruments as theſe, Andronodorus had great need of: as alſo of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themiſtius, that had married Harmonia, the ſiſter of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like paſſions of his own, and of his Wife. But in ſeeking to increaſe the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the reſt of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themiſtius, entring into the Senate, were ſlain out of hand: and afterward accuſed to the People, of all the evil which they had done, whilſt Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now ſince attempted, in ſeeking to uſurp the Tyranny themſelves. It was alſo declared, that the Daughters of Hiero and Gelo, were acceſſary to this dangerous Treaſon: and that the unquiet Spirits of theſe Women, would never ceaſe to work, until they had recovered thoſe Royal Ornaments, and Soveraign Power, whereof their Family was now diſpoſſeſſed. Theſe Daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo, were alſo condemned to die: and Executioners preſently ſent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata, and Harmonia, had perhaps deſerved this heavy ſentence: but Heraclea, the Daughter of Hiero, and Wife of Soſippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered together with her two young Daughters, in the haſty Execution of this raſh judgment. Her Husband, Soſippus, was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that reſpect ſo hated by Hieronymus, that being ſent Embaſſador to King Ptolomy, &c. he durſt not return home, but ſtayed in Ægypt, as a baniſhed man. This conſideration, when it was too late, together with ſome other pitiful accidents accompanying the ſlaughter, ſo affected the multitude, that (pardoning themſelves) all cryed out upon the authors of ſo foul a Butchery. Being thus incenſed againſt the Senate, and knowing not otherwiſe how to ſatisfie their anger; they called for an Election of new Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themiſtius, that were lately ſlain: meaning to ſubſtitute ſuch in their places, as the Senators ſhould have little cauſe to like. At the Election were preſent a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of Souldiers that preſſed into the throng. One of theſe, named Epicides, Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the leſs that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general cry forced them to be accepted. Theſe being made Prætors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracuſians and the Romans. But having ſtriven in vain, and ſeeing that the People ſtood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gave way unto the time, and ſuffered the old League of Hiero to be re-confirmed; which afterward they purpoſed to diſſolve by practice. The Leontines had ſome need of a Garriſon: and to them was ſent Hippocrates, the Prætor; attended by ſuch Fugitives, and mercinary Souldiers, as were moſt burdenſome to Syracuſe. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of Hoſtility againſt the Romans: firſt in ſecret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly underſtanding the purpoſe of theſe two brethren, ſent word unto the Syracuſians, that they had already broken the League: and that the Peace would never be kept ſincerely, until this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Iſland. Epicides, fearing to ſuſtain the blame of his Brother's proceedings, and more deſirous to ſet forward the War, than to excuſe any breach of peace, went himſelf unto the Leontines, whom he perſwaded to rebel againſt the Syracuſians. For he ſaid, that ſince they had all of late ſerved one Maſter, there was little reaſon why the Leontines ſhould not be enfranchiſed by his death as well as the Syracuſians; yea, or much rather, all things conſidered; ſince in their ſtreets the Tyrant was ſlain, and liberty firſt proclaimed. Wherefore, ſince they of Syracuſe were not contented, to enjoy the freedom purchaſed among the Leontines; but thought it good reaſon, that they ſhould bear Dominion over thoſe that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that ſuch their arrogancy ſhould be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by preſcription. Hereunto occaſion was given by one Article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracuſians. For it was agreed, That all which had been ſubject to Hiero and Hieronymus, ſhould henceforth be Vaſſals unto the State of Syracuſe. Againſt this Article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedom, which their Fathers had loſt not many Ages before. Neither was it unreaſonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been ſubdued by the ſame hand, which took liberty from the Syracuſians. But ſeeing they had long ſince yielded unto Syracuſe, and been ſubject unto that that City, by what form ſoever it was governed; this claim of liberty was rather ſeaſonable than juſt. Nevertheleſs the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inſomuch that when Meſſengers came ſoon after from Syracuſe, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done againſt the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they ſhould get them gone, either to Locri, or whither elſe they liſted, ſo that they ſtayed not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requeſted the Syracuſians, to make any bargains for them with the Romans, nor thought themſelves bound to obſerve the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory anſwer, was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracuſians: who offered him their aſſiſtance in doing juſtice upon the Leontines, their Rebels; with condition that when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better ſatisfaction: but forthwith took the buſineſs in hand; which he diſpatched in one day. At the firſt aſſault, Leontium was taken: all, ſave the Caſtle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and ſtealing thence away by night, conveyed themſelves into the Town of Herbeſus. The firſt thing that Marcellus did, when he had won the Town, was the ſame, which other Roman Captains uſed after Victory; to ſeek out the fugitive Roman Slaves and Renegadoes, whom he cauſed all to die: the reſt both of the Townſmen and Souldiers, he took to mercy; forbearing alſo to ſtrip or ſpoil them. But the fame of his doings was bruted after a contrary ſort. It was ſaid, that he had ſlain Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Town to ſack. Theſe news met the Syracuſian Army upon the way, as it was going to joyn with Marcellus, who had ended his buſineſs before. About Eight thouſand Mercinaries there were, that had been ſent forth of Syracuſe, under Soſis and Dinomenes, two of the Prætors, to ſerve againſt the Leontines, and other Rebels. Theſe Captains were honeſt men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the Souldiers that followed them, had thoſe Diſeaſes, with which all Mercinaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-Souldiers (as now they termed thoſe againſt whom they went) had been ſo cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it beſt, to turn their unquiet thoughts another way, and ſet them a-work in ſome place elſe: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their ſervice. So toward Herbeſus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this miſchief, deviſing what further harm they might do; but now ſo weakly accompanied, that they ſeemed unable to eſcape the puniſhments belonging to their offences paſt. Hereof the two brethren were no leſs well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little leſs deſperate than their preſent caſe. They iſſued forth of Herbeſus unarmed, with Olive-branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and ſo preſented themſelves to the Army. Six hundred men of Creete were in the Vantguard, that had been well uſed by Hieronymus; and ſome of them greatly bound unto Hannibal; who had taken them Priſoners in the Italian War, and lovingly diſmiſſed them. Theſe Cretans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bad them be of good chear; ſaying, that no man ſhould do them harm, as long as they could uſe their Weapons. Herewithal the Army was at a ſtand; and the rumour of this accident ran ſwiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by Severity; which would not ſerve. For when they commanded theſe two Traitors to be laid in Irons; the Exclamation was ſo violent againſt them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what courſe to take, unto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deviſed a trick, whereby to help himſelf, and better the uncertain caſe wherein he ſtood. He cauſed Letters of his own penning, to be intercepted by ſome of his moſt truſty Cretans; directed (as they made ſhew) from the Syracuſian Prætors, to Marcellus. The Contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the Sword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoved him, to make the like diſpatch of all the Mercinaries belonging to Syracuſe; which were offenſive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epiſtle was openly rehearſed; the uproar was ſuch, that Soſis and his fellow-Prætor, were glad to forſake the Camp, and fly for their lives. All the Syracuſians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the Sedition had not ſaved their lives, rather to keep them as Pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They perſwaded alſo a miſchievous Knave that had ſerved among the Leontines, to juſtifie the bruit of Marcellus his cruelty; and to carry home the news to Syracuſe, as an Eye-witneſs. This incenſed not only the multitude, but ſome of the Senate; and filled the whole Town with cauſeleſs indignation. In good time (ſaid ſome) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like ſort gotten into Syracuſe, would have dealt much worſe; where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whilſt they were thus diſcourſing, and deviſing how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates, with his Army, came to the Gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unleſs for want of help, they would be betrayed to their Enemies. The Prætors, with the beſt and wiſeſt of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the Souldiers to force a Gate, was no whit greater than the head-ſtrong fury of thoſe within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entred, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forſaken by all men) he put to the Sword, and made ſlaughter of them and their followers until night. The next day he went openly to work; and after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty to all Slaves and Priſoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worſt and baſeſt ſort, made himſelf and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuſe.

When Marcellus was advertiſed of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to ſit ſtill, and attend the further iſſue. He ſent Embaſſadors to Syracuſe, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chaſed out as Enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and an half of the Town, ſent before him, ſome to require a parley. Theſe were entertained without the Walls, by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were were come thither, not with purpoſe to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracuſians, which were oppreſſed by Tyrants; and to puniſh thoſe, that had murdered and baniſhed ſo many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required, that thoſe worthy men, their Confederates, which were chaſed out of the Town, might be ſuffered to return and enjoy their own; as alſo that the Authors of the great ſlaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly anſwered, That if their Errand had been to him, he could have told what to ſay to them: but ſince it was directed unto others, they ſhould do well to return, when thoſe to whom they were ſent, had the Government in their hands. As for the War which they threatned, he told them, they ſhould find by experience, that to beſiege Syracuſe, was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he ſent them gone, and returned back into the City. Immediately began the Siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and eaſie winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that ſo long a circuit of Walls, as compaſſed Syracuſe, being manned with no better kind of Souldiers, than thoſe with whom he had lately dealt, would in ſome part or other, be taken at the firſt aſſault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning, but did his beſt both by Land and Sea. Nevertheleſs all his labour was diſappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill ſucceſs of two or three of the firſt aſſaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any ſtrength of the City, that bred ſuch deſpair of haſty Victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuſe, Archimedes, the noble Mathematician; who at the requeſt of Hiero, the late King, that was his Kinſman, had framed ſuch Engines of War, as being in this extremity put in uſe, did more miſchief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Cannon, or any inſtruments of Gun-powder, had they in that Age been known. This Archimedes diſcourſing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were poſſible to remove the whole Earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were ſome other Earth, or place of ſure footing, whereon a man might ſtand. For proof of this bold aſſertion, he performed ſome ſtrange works; which made the King intreat him to convert his ſtudy unto things of uſe, that might preſerve the City from danger of Enemies. To ſuch Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philoſophers of thoſe times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the Liberal Sciences, to ſubmit learned Propoſitions unto the workmanſhip, and gain of baſe handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an Author; who greatly blamed ſome Geometricians, that ſeemed unto him to profane their Science, by making it vulgar. Neither muſt we raſhly task a man ſo wiſe as Plato, with the imputation of ſupercilious auſterity, or affected ſingularity in his reprehenſion. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were publiſhed: and being once made known, to be under-valued, as falling within compaſs of the meaneſt wit, and things, that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable Example of Columbus his diſcovery, with the much different ſorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and moſt homely Example, we may ſee moſt apparent proof. He that looks upon our Engliſh Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exerciſed in the Trade, will think it ridiculous to hear one ſay, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from ſome of an extraordinary knowledg in Natural Philoſophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leſs, for that the labour of workmanſhip grows to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be ſaid of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being deviſed, and bettered, by great Scholars and wiſe men, grew afterward corrupted by thoſe, to whom the practiſe fell; that is, by ſuch, as could ſlubber things eaſily over, and feed their Workmen at the cheapeſt rate. In this reſpect therefore, the Alchymiſts, and all others, that have, or would ſeem to have any ſecret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind; are not without excuſe of their cloſe concealing. For it is a kind of injuſtice, that the long Travels of an underſtanding Brain, beſide the loſs of time, and other expence, ſhould be caſt away upon men of no worth, or yield leſs benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer ſtrangers; and perhaps his Enemies. And ſurely, if the paſſion of Envy, have in it any thing allowable and natural, as have Anger, Fear, and other the like Affections: it is in ſome ſuch caſe as this; and ſerveth againſt thoſe which would uſurp the knowledg, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Nevertheleſs if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to bear unto the generality of Mankind, after the example of him that ſuffereth his Sun to ſhine upon the juſt and unjuſt: it will appear more commendable in wiſe men, to enlarge themſelves, and to publiſh unto the World, thoſe good things that lie buried in their own boſoms. This ought ſpecially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it ſome dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a miſchievous uſe. For if the ſecret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giving ſome deadly and irrecoverable poyſon: better it were that ſuch a Jewel remain cloſe in the hands of a wiſe and honeſt man; than being made common, bind all men to uſe the remedy, by teaching the worſt men how to do miſchief. But the works which Archimedes publiſhed, were ſuch as tended to very commendable ends. They were Engines, ſerving unto the defence of Syracuſe; not fit for the Syracuſians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppreſſion of others. Neither did he altogether publiſh the knowledg, how to uſe them, but reſerved ſo much to his own direction, that after his death more of the ſame kind were not made, nor thoſe of his own making were employed by the Romans. It ſufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved, even unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done eſpecial benefit unto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanical Trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was beſides his purpoſe.

Marcellus had cauſed certain of his Quinquereme Gallies to be faſtened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the Wall. Againſt theſe, Archimedes had ſundry devices; of which any one ſort might have repelled the aſſailants: but all of them together ſhewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He ſhot heavy ſtones and long pieces of Timber, like unto the Yards of Ships; which brake ſome of the Gallies by their force and weight. Theſe afflicted afflicted ſuch as lay far off. They that were come nearer the Walls, lay open to a continual Volly of Shot, which they could not endure. Some with an Iron grapple were taken by the Prow, and hoiſted up; ſhaking out all the men; and afterward falling down into the water. Some by ſtrange Engines were lifted up into the air; where turning round a while, they were broken againſt the Walls, or caſt upon the Rocks; and all of them were ſo beaten, that they durſt never come to any ſecond aſſault. In like ſort was the Land-Army handled: Stones and Timber, falling upon it like Hail; did not only overwhelm the Men, but brake down the Roman Engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the aſſault. For remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day, get near unto the Walls; they ſhould be (as it were) under the point blanck, and receive no hurt by theſe terrible Inſtruments; which were wound up hard, to ſhoot a great compaſs. But this vain hope coſt many of the aſſailants lives. For the ſhot came down right upon them: and beating them from all parts of the Wall, made a great ſlaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to ſtay by it) even till they were gotten very far off. This did ſo terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of Timber, or a Ropes end, upon the Walls, they ran away, crying out, that Archimedes his Engines were ready to diſcharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome theſe difficulties, or to take away from his Men, that fear; againſt the cauſe whereof he knew no remedy. If the Engines had ſtood upon the Wall, ſubject to firing, or any ſuch annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by ſome device, to make them unſerviceable. But all, or the moſt of them were out of ſight; being erected in the ſtreets behind the Walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to uſe them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Town all proviſion of Victuals, both by Land and by Sea. This was a deſperate piece of work. For the Enemies having ſo goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were ſtrong by Sea, willing to ſupply them; were not likely ſo ſoon to be conſumed with famine, as the beſiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before ſo ſtrong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counſel to follow, this was thought the beſt, and moſt honourable courſe.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates advertiſed of theſe paſſages, went home to Carthage; and there ſo dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thouſand Foot, three thouſand Horſe, and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make War upon the Romans in Sicil by Land. He took many Towns; and many, that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians, did yield unto him. To remedy this miſchief, and to ſtay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, began to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus, with a great part of his Army, roſe from Syracuſe, and went from place to place about the Iſland. He took Pelorus and Herbeſus, which yielded unto him. He took alſo Megara by force, and ſackt it: either to terrifie others that were obſtinate, eſpecially the Syracuſians; or elſe becauſe Rome was at this time poor, and his Army muſt have ſomewhat to keep it in heart. His eſpecial deſire was to have ſaved Agrigentum; whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuſe; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian, that was too ſtrong for him. The circumſpection that he uſed, in regard of Himilco, ſtood him in good ſtead, againſt a danger that he had not miſtruſted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuſe unto his Brother, had lately iſſued out of the City, with ten thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe; intending to joyn his Forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an eaſie Victory, againſt the diſperſed, and half unarmed Syracuſians. The Reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from Rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ran over all the Iſland at his pleaſure; and preſented Battel to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wiſely refuſed it. Bomilcar alſo a Carthaginian, entred with a great Fleet into the Haven of Syracuſe, and victualled the City. After this, the diſpoſition of the Iſlanders changed ſo again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which eſcaped from Himilco, and ſafely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians; and ſlew or betrayed the Roman Garriſons.

In the midſt of theſe troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus leaving ſome of his Army before Syracuſe, that he might not ſeem to have given over the Siege, went unto Leontium; where he lay intentive to all occaſions. In the beginning of the Spring, he ſtood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of beſieging Syracuſe; or to turn all his Forces to Agrigentum, againſt Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his Reputation, if he had gone from Syracuſe, as unable to prevail: and he himſelf was of an eager diſpoſition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feaſible, an Enterpriſe, that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuſe: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before, and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth ſomewhat, which might fulfil his deſire. Eſpecially he aſſayed to prevail by Treaſon; againſt which no place can hold out. And to this end, he dealt with the Syracuſian Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practiſe with their friends that remained in the City. This was not eaſie for them to do; becauſe the Town would hearken to no parley. At length a Slave unto one of theſe baniſhed men, making ſhew to run away from his Maſter, got into Syracuſe; where he talked in private with ſome few, as he had been inſtructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conſpirators uſed to ſend him advertiſement of their proceedings, by a Fiſher-boat that paſſed forth in the night. But when they were grown to the number of Fourſcore, and thought themſelves able to effect ſomewhat of importance: all was diſcovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the mean while, one Damaſippus, a Lacedæmonian, that had been ſent out of the Town, as an Embaſſador to Philip, King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very deſirous to ranſome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpoſe, not far from the Walls. There one of the Romans looking upon the Wall, and wanting the more compendious art of Geometry, fell to numbring the ſtones: and, making an eſtimate of the height, judged it leſs than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who cauſing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that Ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakeſt part of the Town, and therefore the moſt ſtrongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force againſt Archimedes, if they failed to take it by ſurpriſe. But a Fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great Feaſt was to be held unto Diana, which was to laſt three days: and that, becauſe other good chear was not ſo plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large diſtribution of Wine. A better opportunity could not be wiſhed. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the feſtival night, came unto the Walls; which he took by Scalado. Syracuſe was divided into four parts (or five, if Epipolæ were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diſtinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten ſome pieces, he had the commodity of a better and ſafe lodging, with good ſtore of booty; and better opportunity than before, to deal with the reſt. For there were now a great many, as well of thoſe in Acradina, and the Iſland, inner parts of the Town, as of thoſe that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto compoſition; as being much terrified by the loſs of thoſe parts, which the Romans had taken and ſackt. As for the Weapons of Archimedes, little harm, or none they did, unto thoſe that were ſheltred under ſtrong houſes: although it may ſeem, that the inner Walls were not altogether unfurniſhed of his help; ſince they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman Fugitives, and Renegadoes, were more careful than ever to defend the reſt of the City; being ſure to be rewarded with a cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradina, upon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part, that the aſſailants were repelled. Nevertheleſs, they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtreightly beſieged, as he himſelf did beſiege the Town. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and cauſed the reſt to diſlodg. The Romans were (though ſomewhat leſs) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, inſomuch that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great Forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to do his Countrey ſervice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a ſtrong Fleet: where he ſtayed; being loth to double the Cape; for that the Winds did better ſerve the Enemy than him. Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman Fleet, that was ready for him, he ſtood off into the deep; and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durſt not Epicides return into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue, with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Souldiers, that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could ſafely, unto Marcellus; and ſome of them in a ſtrong Town three Miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicil was given as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadors to treat of Peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelves, and for the Town: Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had ſtayed there long enough; and had cauſe to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong again. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they ſhould be Maſters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws; yet ſuffering the Romans to poſſeſs whatſoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Prætors choſen; and the Gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman Fugitives diſturbed all. Theſe perceiving their own condition to be deſperate, perſwaded the other Mercinary Souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themſelves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently took Arms, and fell upon the new choſen Prætors; whom they ſlew; and made Election of ſix Captains that ſhould command over all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the Fugitives. The Treaty therefore was again ſet on foot, and wanted little of concluſion; which yet was delayed, either by ſome fear of the Citizens, that had ſeen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the ſack of Epipolæ, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might uſe the liberty of a Conqueror, and make it wholly ſubject unto Rome. Mericus, a Spaniard, was one of the ſix Captains, that had been choſen in the late commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as uſually is found in Mercinaries; holding his own particular benefit above all other reſpects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: having a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embaſſadors, daily paſſing too and fro. This crafty Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purpoſed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where elſe; it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himſelf to the will of the Roman General. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captain was eaſily won: and ſent forth his own Brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadors, to ratifie the Covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot well be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been ſuch, as deſerved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrey: much leſs, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercinaries, ſhould miniſter unto the people of Rome, advantage againſt them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yield unto the time; and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the Death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately slain many the principal of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also been slain, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascality, and some ill advised persons, joyned with the Souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a Treaty of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captain of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home. But the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, and promises of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many ways important. Nevertheless, if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious, both by evil Neighbours, and by that very form of polity, after which it was governed: we may truly affirm, That it received no small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forreign Enemies, Domestical Conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested by the Disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his Victory it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable; unless we should approve the answer of that Thief, who being found to have stolen a silver cup from a sick man, said, He never leaves drinking.

By the Treason of Mericus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to have been no less, than could have been hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it self; that maintained War by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched, save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitiful accidents, the Death of Archimedes, was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so busie about his Geometry, in drawing Figures, that he hearkned not to the noise and uproar in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the Death of him; and caused his Body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tomb (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an Inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An Invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great Artist better, than the devising of all those Engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is between the judgment of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the Money lost, that had been spent upon a Son, whose Studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicil yielded unto the Romans; except Agrigentum, and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides, with one Hanno, a Carthaginian, and Mutines, an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withal made his own name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town; and not behave themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsel, than in execution. Once and again he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envy in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and to take upon him, like as good a man as himself. The indignity seemed the greater, when Mutines, being to step aside unto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the Enemy, until his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battel unto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds between the Captains. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth, and ability, in matter of War. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vain-glorious Envy of Hanno carried him unto the Fight, upon a foolish desire to get Victory, without the help of Mutines, their Countreyman. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bad him be confident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his Enemies that day; but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set upon the Enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not have hazarded a battel without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into terms of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus, was shortly after to leave the Province; and soon upon his departure, there landed in the Island a supply of Eight thousand Foot, and three thousand Numidian Horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians into Rebellion. The Roman Army, conſiſting (for the moſt part) of the Legions of Cannæ, took it very heinouſly, that no good ſervice done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as baniſhed men, they were ſent far from home, and not ſuffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Countreymen the Numidians; and, like an honeſt man, did the beſt that he could for thoſe whom he ſerved, without contending againſt the fooliſh pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been intire. M. Cornelius, the Roman Prætor, uſed all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered thoſe inland Towns that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from overrunning all the Countrey; yet he hindred the Countrey from revolting unto Mutines. Above threeſcore Towns, great and ſmall, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which, Agrigentum was the principal; and far bigger than any of the reſt. Thence iſſued Mutines as often as he pleaſed, in deſpight of the Romans: not only to the ſuccour of his own adherents, but to the great waſte of thoſe that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, inſtead of being pleaſed with all theſe good ſervices, was filled more and more with envy, againſt the man that performed them. He had (belike) received inſtructions from old Hanno at Carthage; not to ſuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have ſhare in the honour of theſe Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently ſupplied; whilſt Italy was neglected, that ſhould have been regarded more than all the reſt. Wherefore, to ſhew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Aſſiſtant, or Director: he took away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his own Son; thinking thereby to diſcountenance the man, and make him little eſteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this ſpightful dealing, occaſioned the loſs of whatſoever the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were ſo incenſed by the indignity offered unto their Countreyman, being ſuch a brave Commander, that they offered him their ſervice to requite the wrong, and were thenceforth abſolutely at his own diſpoſition. M. Valerius Lævinus, the Roman Conſul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook theſe indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by thoſe that bore all the ſway in Carthage; he thought it the wiſeſt way, to play the beſt of his own game, and forſake that City, which was likely to periſh by the evil counſel that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countreymen had lately done, content himſelf to ſee his Adverſaries reap the bitter fruits of their own malicious over-weening: and to ſuffer that harm, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conſpired againſt them, to deliver up Agrigentum, and to help to expel them utterly out of Sicil. The Conſul was glad of his friendſhip; and carefully followed his advertiſements. Neither was there much cunning needful, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken. For he, with his Numidians, did forcibly ſeize upon a gate; whereat they let in ſome Roman Companies, that lay near in a readineſs for the purpoſe. Hanno, when firſt he heard the noiſe, thought it had been no worſe matter, than ſome ſuch tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when, making haſte to pacifie the trouble, he ſaw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among thoſe diſcontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betook himſelf to flight: and ſaving himſelf, with Epicides, in a ſmall Bark, ſet ſail for Africk; leaving all his Army and adherents in Sicil, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued Maſters of the whole Iſland.

Lævinus, the Conſul, having taken Agrigentum, did ſharp execution of juſtice upon all the Citizens. The principal of them he ſcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the reſt of them he ſold for Slaves, and confiſcated their goods; ſending home to Rome the Money that was raiſed of the booty. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome ſtood in no leſs neceſſity of gold than of ſteel: which may have been the reaſon, why Lævinus dealt ſo cruelly with the Agrigentines. Nevertheleſs, the fame of ſuch ſeverity, bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; ſo that in great haſte they ſought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themſelves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treaſon; and ſix only ſtaid to be won by force. Theſe things done, Lævinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about four thouſand men from Agatirna; that were a Company of Out-laws, Bankrouts, and baniſhed men, accuſtomed to live by ſpoil of others, in theſe troubleſome times. He beſtowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exerciſe their occupation againſt the Brutians, a thieviſh kind of people, that were enemies unto thoſe of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good account; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journey againſt Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is ſaid) very eſpecial ſervice. So by this Enterpriſe of Sicil, the Carthaginians waſted much of their Forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this War, the entire poſſeſſion of this Iſland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the War paſſed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great Victory at Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where, for his good ſervices done in the Iſland of Sicil, he had granted unto him the honour of the leſſer Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: becauſe he had not finiſhed the War, but was fain to leave his Army behind him in the Province. He ſtayed not long in Rome, before he was again choſen Conſul, together with M. Valerius Lævinus, who ſucceeded him in the government of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making War againſt King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made againſt the Conſul Marcellus, by the Syracuſians, for that which he had done unto them: they alledging their great friendſhip to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppreſſed by ſuch Tyrants, as were not greater Enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuſe. The Conſul, on the other ſide, reckoned up the labours and dangers whereunto whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoan themſelves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their neceſſity; and not unto the Romans, whom they had kept out. Thus each part having ſome good matter to alledg, the Senate made ſuch an end of the Controverſie, as beſt agreed with the benefit of their own Commonwealth: blaming the too much rigor of Marcellus; yet not reſtoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracuſians free from their ſubjection; but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopeful promiſes, as hath been ſhewed before. The two new Conſuls, Marcellus and Lævinus, were appointed to make War, as their lots ſhould fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicil. The Iſle of Sicil fell unto Marcellus, which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague, to the end that the Syracuſians (whoſe cauſe had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not ſeem hindred by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his buſineſs with them was diſpatcht, he gently undertook the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family; to the great benefit of their Countrey in times following. So Valerius, the other Conſul, was ſent into Sicil, whoſe doings there have been already rehearſed: but Marcellus was employed againſt Hannibal.

Before the Conſuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preſſing of Souldiers to the War; and moſt of all, with getting Marriners for their Navy. They were all of the poorer ſort, that uſed to be employed in Sea-ſervices; eſpecially in rowing. Theſe could not live without preſent wages: neither was there Money enough in the Treaſury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they ſhould be ſet out at the expence of private men; who, in this neceſſity of the State, were driven to ſuſtain all publick charges. Hereat the People murmured; and were ready to fall into ſedition, had not the Conſuls deferred the matter unto further conſideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or do, in a caſe of ſuch extremity. For manifeſt it was, that the Multitude had already endured ſo much, as well it could undergo; and ſomewhat more than could with honeſty have been impoſed upon it. Nevertheleſs it was impoſſible to maintain the War againſt the Carthaginians, or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy, without a ſtrong Fleet. Wherefore, ſome were of opinion, That, ſince the common Treaſury was ſo empty, the People muſt be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At laſt the Conſuls began to ſay, That no perſwaſions would be ſo effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Conſuls, like it was, that the People alſo would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them ſhould bring forth, and put into the Treaſury, all the Money that he had; and that no Senator ſhould keep any veſſel of Gold, or Plate whatſoever; excepting one Salt-ſeller, and a Boul, wherewith to make their offerings unto the Gods: as alſo a Ring for himſelf, with ſuch other tokens of ingenuity for his Wife and Children, as every one did uſe, and thoſe of as ſmall value as might be. This advice of the Conſuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and haſtily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuſe to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For ſince the publick neceſſity could no otherwiſe be holpen, every one was contented that his private Eſtate ſhould run the ſame fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it ſuffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper ſubſtance. This Magnanimity deſerved well that greatneſs of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City againſt Hannibal; and Lævinus toward Sicil. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminiſhed, by long and hard ſervice: neither did his Carthaginians ſeem to remember him, and think upon ſending the promiſed ſupply, or any ſuch proportion as he needed. His credit alſo among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loſs of Capua: which gave them cauſe to look unto themſelves; as if in his help there were little truſt to be repoſed, when they ſhould ſtand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he muſt thruſt Garriſons into all Towns that he ſuſpected, and thereby ſo diminiſh his Army, that he ſhould not be able to keep the Field: or elſe he muſt leave them to their own fidelity; which now began to waver. At length his jealouſie grew ſo outragious, that he ſacked, and waſted thoſe places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the beſt way to enrich himſelf; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchaſe from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and ſome of thoſe, whom before he had leaſt cauſe to doubt. The Town of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus: and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian Horſe, the beſt of all that ſerved under Hannibal; which was a greater loſs than the Town it ſelf. Blaſius, the author of this Rebellion, could not bring his deſire to effect, without getting the conſent of one Daſius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Daſius in private; and was by him accuſed unto Hannibal. But when he was convented, and charged of Treaſon, he ſo ſtoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, ſo vehemently preſſed his accuſer with the ſame fault; that Hannibal thought it a matter deviſed out of meer Malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and ſeeing, that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithſtanding, Blaſius did not ceaſe to preſs his adverſary a-new, and urge him from time to time, with ſuch lively reaſons, that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Preſently after this, the Conſul took by force, Maronea and Meles, Towns of the Samnites: wherein he ſlew about three thouſand of Hannibal's men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once: but was fain to catch advantages where he might get them; the Romans now being grown ſtronger in the field than he. The beſt was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themſelves with ill ſpeed in many petty enterpriſes, and laid aſide all this while the care of Italy, to follow buſineſs of far leſs importance; had now at length reſolved, to ſend preſently the great ſupply, that had been ſo long promiſed and expected. This if they had done in better ſeaſon, Rome it ſelf might have been ſtrucken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannæ. But ſince that which is paſt cannot be amended; Hannibal muſt force himſelf to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty ſuccour would come time enough. For Maſaniſſa was at Carthage with five thouſand Numidians, ready to ſet ſail for Spain: whither when when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal ſhould forthwith take his journey into Italy; of which there had been ſo long talk. Theſe news did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their beſt: the Romans to prevent the threatning miſchief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his Brother: Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, lay near unto Herdonea, to get the Town by practice. It was not long, ſince, near unto the ſame place, another Cn. Fulvius had loſt his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great Marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As ſoon as he came, he offered battel to the Roman Prætor: who accepted it with more haſte than good ſpeed. The Roman Legions made good reſiſtance a while, till they were compaſſed round with the Carthaginian Horſe. Then fell they to rout; and great ſlaughter was made of them. Fulvius himſelf, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were loſt: of the common Souldiers that were ſlain, the number is uncertain; ſome reporting ſeven, others thirteen thouſand. The Town of Herdonea, becauſe it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did ſet on fire: and putting thoſe to death that had practiſed with the Enemy, carried away the Multitude; whom he beſtowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conſul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good chear; for that he would ſhortly abate the Enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace: and overtaking him at Numiſtro, in the Countrey of the Lucans, fought with him a battel: which beginning at Nine of the Clock in the morning, laſted until night; and ended, by reaſon of the darkneſs, with uncertain Victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia: whither Marcellus followed him. At Venuſia they met, and had many skirmiſhes: but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and ſought to bring the Enemy within danger of ſome ambuſh. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battel, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus paſſed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were choſen Conſuls. Fabius, conſidering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purpoſed that year to beſiege Tarentum: which if he could win, like it was, that ſcarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the Command of thoſe Legions that ſerved under him the year before) to preſs the Carthaginian ſo hard, as he might have no leiſure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himſelf, to deal with Hannibal in open Field. He followed him therefore to Cannuſium, and thence from place to place: deſiring ever to come to battel, but upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his Enemy with skirmiſh; as being deſirous to keep his Army ſtrong until the coming of Aſdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus; nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bad his Men to be luſty, and to beat ſoundly this hot-ſpirited Roman Captain, that would never ſuffer them to be at quiet, until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battel: wherein Hannibal had the victory; took ſix Enſigns, and ſlew of the Romans almoſt three thouſand, among which were ſome of mark. Marcellus was ſo impatient of this diſhonour, that he rated his men as Peaſants, and baſe Cowards: telling them, that they were the firſt of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood; without being circumvented by any ſtratagem. With theſe, and many other the like words, which they were aſhamed to hear, he did ſo vex them, that thinking themſelves better able to endure any violence of the Enemy, than ſuch diſpleaſure of their General; they beſought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did ſo: and placing thoſe Companies formoſt, that had loſt their Enſigns the day before, bad them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their ſhameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to ſee that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight again; ſince all other Motives continued the ſame, and his Men had been heartned by the late victory. But the Romans were ſtirred up with deſire of revenge, and of repairing their honour loſt, which affections gave a ſharp edg unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary, by ſeeing themſelves diſappointed of their hope: and the Enemy, notwithſtanding their late victory, as ready to moleſt them as before. In this ſecond battel Marcellus got the victory: which he purchaſed at ſo dear a rate, that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cauſe to vaunt the ſecond night. For if eight thouſand of the Carthaginians were ſlain, and three thouſand of the Roman ſide, in this next battel, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: eſpecially ſince the number of the Romans that were wounded, was ſo great, as diſabled Marcellus from purſuing Hannibal; who diſlodged by night. Nevertheleſs it ſufficed, that Fabius, the Conſul, hereby got leiſure to follow his buſineſs at Tarentum, without any diſturbance. Q. Fulvius, the other Conſul, about the ſame time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volſcentes, that willingly yielded themſelves, and betrayed the Garriſons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns: whom Fulvius entertained in loving ſort; gently rebuking them for their Errors paſt, without puniſhing thoſe that had been authors, or buſie doers in the Rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian Thieves, which Lævinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then alſo ſet on work to beſiege Caulonia, a Town of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might ſerve to divert Hannibal, from the ſuccour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius, the Conſul, having taken Manduria, a Town of the Salentines, ſate down before Tarentum: making all preparation that ſeemed needful to carry it, either by aſſault, or long Siege. Of the Garriſons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine Wench; whoſe brother ſerved under Fabius. Hereof, ſhe gave notice by Letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman ſide; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Conſul acquainted with theſe news: and ſaid, that if the Brutian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Miſtreſs, to do what ſhe would have him. The Conſul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, matter, willed his Souldier to convey himself into the Town as a Fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own perswasions, partly by the flattering entreaty of his Sister; wan him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the business, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept Watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night-time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the Wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself, with the choice of his Men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate; whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines, and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market-place: but (as it hapneth in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage, in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the Sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seem to have won the Town by force, and not by Treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols, that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry Gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so near, that they were fain to betake them to a Hill; which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this; The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few days together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These Letters were sent by two young men of the same City: who did their Errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made ready his Ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the Plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed again: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their Wars: for they got every where, save only at Caulonia; where they lost a Company of such lewd fellows, that it may seem good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, Twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered, that the Legions of Cannæ, and those unhappy Companies, that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of Men, and impositions of Money: in every of which years, they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear; or rather the best which they could hope, was, to fall into the hands of the Enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to pass within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never did return. Such talk was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of Twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans, their farther help. This was thought the likeliest way to obtain peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, so long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Towns make such declaration, and protest their disability of giving any farther help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to return home, and bring a better answer; forasmuch as this, was none other than Treason: they bad them to consider, that their people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no less partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not serve: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither Men, nor Money. It was well for the Romans, that the other Eighteen Colonies did not imitate these Twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergo whatsoever should be laid upon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls, that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good ſervices, this their preſent love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly beſtowed upon them; with promiſe, that it ſhould not be forgotten. As for the Embaſſadors of thoſe Twelve Colonies, that refuſed to contribute; it was thought beſt, neither to retain them in the City, nor yet to diſmiſs them, nor to take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own conſideration of their ill deſerving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the Example of theſe Twelve People would have wrought, in thoſe that were ſo willing to help the State, if Aſdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then muſt the Romans have betaken themſelves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their Subjects, they employed their forces in the conqueſt of Italy, with hopeful and fortunate ſucceſs. Nevertheleſs, they were fain to open their moſt privy Treaſury; and thence take out the Gold, that had been laid up to ſerve them in caſes of greateſt extremity. Of the Money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Conſul, to ſet him well out againſt the Tarentines: all the reſt was ſent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide, that Aſdrubal might not paſs from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not ſpend all his Money; finding ſuch eaſie ſucceſs at Tarentum, as was ſhewed before. But to ſtop the journey of Aſdrubal, neither the Money ſent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could ſuffice. Nevertheleſs it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next, were ſpent before his coming; and they better prepared, than at leſs warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiſs to note, That ſince the Romans, being in ſo great neceſſity of Money, were driven to furniſh the Army in Spain, with the greateſt part of all their ſtock that was left: it muſt needs be, that either the booty taken in New Carthage, was far leſs than fame had reported it; or elſe that Scipio had not as yet won it: howſoever Livy rather inclines to thoſe, who ſay that he got it ſoon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Criſpinus, were choſen Conſuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Aſdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following. After the great battel at Cannæ, Hannibal had loſt much time about Cumæ and Naples, in ſeeking to make himſelf Maſter of a good Haven, for the landing of thoſe ſuccours that were promiſed from Carthage. The hope that he repoſed in Philip, cauſed him to turn his principal care to the Eaſtern parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come. But ſince this hope was vaniſhed, and the long promiſed ſuccour of Aſdrubal was (though far later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whoſe Countries his brother was to paſs, that therein he might make a party againſt the Romans. The loſs of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from hearkening to any ſolicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and the wearineſs of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, eſpecially the Aretines, to take ſuch counſel as they thought moſt expedient for themſelves; without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their Conſpiracy, ſent Marcellus, the new choſen Conſul, into Hetruria: whoſe coming did ſo terrifie them, that they reſted quiet for a while. All the year following they were deviſing how to break out: as contrariwiſe the Roman Proprætors; partly by terror of ſevere judgments and inquiſitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they viſited all ſuſpected places, kept them honeſt againſt their wills; and took many Hoſtages for better aſſurance. The two Conſuls had an earneſt deſire, to make ſtrong War upon Hannibal, without more temporiſing: perſwading themſelves, that in battel they ſhould be too ſtrong for him. Criſpinus had further his particular deſire, to make his Conſulſhip notable by the winning of ſome good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the Siege of Locri; one of the beſt Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all ſorts of Engines; ſending for a Fleet out of Sicil to help him. But Hannibal was not ſlow to relieve the City: the fame of whoſe approach, made Criſpinus deſiſt from his Enterpriſe, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venuſia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Conſuls daily offered battel. This great man of War had no need to ſtand upon his Reputation: which was already ſo confirmed, that his refuſing to fight, was not likely to be aſcribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wiſdom. He entertained the Conſuls with many light skirmiſhes, and ſought to take them at ſome advantage; reſerving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus took no pleaſure: but ſought to compel the Enemy to battel, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman Fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded again to aſſail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venuſia. To the ſame purpoſe a part of the Garriſon that lay in Tarentum was appointed to go by Land to the aſſiſtance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambuſh in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having loſt above three thouſand of their company, were well glad, the reſt of them, to quit their Enterpriſe, and ſave their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Conſuls, it was the deſire of Hannibal, to waſte their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, over-grown with Wood, that ſeemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiſcerned, might fall upon ſuch, as ſhould ſtraggle from the Roman Camp; and cut them off. Therefore he ſent thither by night ſome Companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themſelves cloſe, and attend their beſt advantage. To this piece of ground, the Conſuls thought it fit to remove their Camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode, to view the place, accompanied with the Son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men, and not many more than two hundred Horſe, moſt of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows; who diſcovered not themſelves, until they had ſurrounded the Conſuls and their Train. The Conſuls, as neceſſity compelled them, defended themſelves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their Camp, that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them at the firſt: and left them in that great danger, to the the weak assistance of no more than Forty Horsemen, that were of the Colony of Frægellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken through with a Launce, and fell down dead; then began every one to shift for himself, and escape as they might. Crispinus, the other Consul, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their Camp. The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundels of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the custom of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a Silver Pot, covered it with a Crown of Gold, and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himself, how that the Signet-Ring of Marcellus, was fallen into the custody of Hannibal; who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had hapned were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about, that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any Letters therewithal signed. This providence of Crispinus, was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing Letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Ring: whereof the Contents were, That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readiness, for such employment as he should think needful. The device was plain: and no less plain was the revengeful mind, which he bare against that City; because of his brave Numidian Companies, that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman Fugitive, without letting him perceive any sign of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readiness, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither, with a Troop of Roman Fugitives, armed Roman like, leading the way. These all talking Latin together, called unto the Watch, and bad open the Gate; for the Consul was there. The Gate was opened, fair and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when six hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this stratagem, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman Fleet about Sicil, did lay hard Siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their Ships: leaving all their Engines, and whatsoever was in their Camp, to the Enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate, hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus, the surviving Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator: that might take charge of the Common-wealth, and dispatch the Election of new Magistrates, with other business; whereunto himself was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after died. Then was it thought needful, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so near unto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not only valiant, but well advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himself so strangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose Temper needed the allay of a more staid Wit. The Fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Consulship M. Livius: one that had born the same Office, long before. This M. Livius had been Consul with L. Æmylius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this War. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgment by the People: and this Livius condemned, Æmylius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once already noted, yet I cannot forbear to remember it again; how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankful Romans, with the malicious judgment, given by their Multitude upon honourable men. For in the battel of Cannæ, it was apparent, what lamentable effects, the Memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Æmylius rather chose to yield to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himself a-new upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diverse manner. Eight years together after his condemnation had he been absent out of the City, and lived in his Countrey Grange; vexing himself with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lævinus, being Consuls two or three years ago, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private, in discontented sort, as might appear, both by his carelesness in apparel, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that age were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors to Poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he used to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed; either in short formal words, or in passing from side to side, when the House was divided. At length it hapned, that in some business weightily concerning one that was his Kinsman, he stood up, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bad them enquire of him, and take better notice what he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many brave men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather served to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say, that it was great pity, so worthy and able a man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not used, in this dangerous War. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessity a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lævinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius

Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livy would not endure to hear of this. He ſaid, it was unreaſonable, that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man, ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe, and the like phraſes, he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions, and Examples rehearſed, of ſuch as had patiently digeſted injuries done by the People, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelf to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for ſhelter in a ſtorm. Such unthankfulneſs, to well-deſerving men, is not rarely found in the outragious Multitude. Neither was the late Example hereto much unlike, of Philip the Second, King of Spain, his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to Priſon, upon ſome ſmall offence conceived, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſervice of a man, more than ordinarily ſufficient; he ſtood no longer upon the ſcanning of late diſpleaſures; but employed the ſame Duke, whom he had newly diſgraced. Thus is wiſdom often taught by neceſſity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were choſen Conſuls. Aſdrubal was already come into France, and waited only to have the ways of the Alpes thawed by warm weather, for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans uſed at this time the ſervice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had known how to levy and maintain them. Of theſe which they had, four ſerved in Spain, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia; the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeveral parts of Italy, where need ſeemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution, and would not be tied to the punctual obſervance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not ſtir out of Rome, againſt ſo mighty a power as followed Aſdrubal; until he had firſt obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be ſpared from other employments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to ſerve under Lucius Porcius, a Prætor of that year, among the Ciſalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the Forces of Livius; to whom the War againſt Aſdrubal was allotted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, near unto Tarentum, under another of the Prætors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was ſent againſt Hannibal. Nevertheleſs the Conſuls, by the eſpecial inſtance of Livy, did obtain, that all might be left to their own diſcretion. For news came, that Aſdrubal was already paſſing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrey about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readineſs to joyn with him; and L. Porcius ſent word, that he would adventure no further, than he ſafely might. When all was ordered, as themſelves thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the City, each his ſeveral way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, than they had been, when L. Æmylius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were ſent againſt Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them diſpatch, and win the Victory betimes; but rather they ſtood in fear, leſt all diligence, wiſdom, and valour, ſhould prove too little. For ſince few years had paſſed, wherein ſome one of their Generals had not been ſlain; and ſince it was manifeſt, that if either of theſe preſent Conſuls were defeated, or put to the worſt, the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyn, and make ſhort work with the other: it ſeemed a greater happineſs than could be expected, that each of them ſhould return home Victor; and come off with honour, from ſuch mighty oppoſition, as he was like to find. With extreme difficulty had Rome held up her head ever ſince the battel of Cannæ: though it were ſo, that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another Son of Amilcar; and one, that in his preſent Expedition, had ſeemed, a man of more ſufficiency than Hannibal himſelf. For, whereas in that long and dangerous March, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpaſſable, Hannibal had loſt a great part of his Army: this Aſdrubal, in the ſame places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, deſcended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees, at his firſt ſetting out of Spain. Theſe conſiderations, and the like, of which, fear preſented many unto them; cauſed the People of Rome, to wait upon their Conſuls out of the Town; like a penſive Train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Criſpinus, upon whom in the like ſort they had given attendance the laſt year, but ſaw neither of them return alive, from a leſs dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accuſtomed advice to M. Livius, that he ſhould abſtain from giving, or taking battel, until he well underſtood the Enemies condition. But the Conſul made him a froward anſwer, and ſaid, That he would fight the very firſt day: for that he thought it long, till he ſhould either recover his honour by victory; or by ſeeing the overthrow of his own unjuſt Citizens, ſatisfie himſelf with the joy of a great, though not an honeſt, revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Aſdrubal received in Spain, by Scipio, a little before he took his journey into Italy; ſuch mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Hiſtorian Livy. Yet I think it not amiſs to add in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his hiſtory, concerning that accident. Aſdrubal had wreſtled with many difficulties in Spain, by reaſon of thoſe Captains that were ſent from the City of Carthage, to joyn with him in the adminiſtration of that Province: they being, as it may ſeem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to ſay, thus far forth Traitors, that they preferred the advantage of their own ſide, before the good of their Commonwealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy Son of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courſes undertaken, it cannot be known: ſince of thoſe books, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled theſe matters, there are to us remaining, only a few broken pieces. But by the ſpightful dealing of Hanno, in Sicil, with Mutines, a better man of War than himſelf, whom Hannibal had ſent into the Iſland; we may conceive, that againſt the brother of Hannibal, it was thought needful, by theſe miſchievous Partiſans of Hanno, to uſe the violent oppoſition of more more earneſt Malice. Nevertheleſs Aſdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently ſuch indignities as Mutines could not long digeſt. His Journey into Italy being reſolved upon; he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not far from the Mines of Silver; whence he was to furniſh his Expedition. Thither came Scipio; and drave him out of his Camp, though he were ſtrongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could, or would, come to his aſſiſtance. The overthrow ſeems not to have been ſo great, as it muſt have been ſuppoſed, if no way lay open to thoſe that fled. Rather it appears, that Aſdrubal dealt like a provident man: and ſeeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, ſent away all his Money, with his Elephants before him: but ſtaid behind himſelf to ſuſtain the Romans a while, until his Carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his deſire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken Troops together; and retired in ſuch ſort, that Scipio thought it not good to purſue him; and ſo paſſed over Tagus. Then taking unto him the Forces aſſigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his brother Mago, and to Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, that thought himſelf the fitteſt man for the adminiſtration thereof. Fain would Scipio have ſtopped him on his journey, by ſending to defend againſt him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Aſdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the Guards that Scipio had ſet to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard paſſages commonly ſorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his Voyage by any ſuch impediment. Coming into Gaule, and following the ſteps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, ſo well affected, either to him or to his Money, that no paſſages were defended againſt him, nor any ſort of reſiſtance made; but he, and his Army, well entertained, and their numbers much increaſed, by acceſs of ſuch as were deſirous to take his pay. Of theſe he had the better choice: for that he was driven to Winter in their Countrey, whilſt that the paſſages of the Alpes were cloſed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountains likewiſe, that had ſo greatly moleſted Hannibal in his journey over the Alpes, were eaſily won to take part with Aſdrubal, when he travelled through their Countrey. For theſe poor men, at the firſt coming of Hannibal, were verily perſwaded, that it was his purpoſe to rob them of their Cattel, and to make ſpoil of that little Wealth, which they had painfully ſcraped together out of the deſolate Rocks. But now in proceſs of time they were better informed. Therefore underſtanding, that there were two mighty Cities, far disjoyned aſunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea: and that the Alpes did only lie in their way; they gladly condeſcended, to take their part in the fortune of the Invaders. The like affection, upon greater cauſe, was afterward found in the Ciſalpine Gaules. The Ligurians alſo joyned with Aſdrubal: and ſo would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Army near, than L. Porcius, with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Aſdrubal ſet upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the deſtruction of that Town. But there he loſt a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the Enterpriſe: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Conſuls leiſure, to make ready for him; and cauſed his brother Hannibal (who upon the firſt bruit of Aſdrubal his ſo timely, and eaſily paſſing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintring Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to ſit ſtill a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haſte.

C. Claudius Nero, the Roman Conſul, made what ſpeed he could, to meet with Hannibal, and ſtop him from joyning with his brother. He had about forty thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe: with which he daily offered battel to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmiſhes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious March from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrey of the Brutians, there to increaſe his Forces; which were otherwiſe too weak for the journey intended. Afterward coming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucans; he there fought unproſperouſly with Nero the Conſul. Nevertheleſs he got off, and marched away to Venuſia. But Nero followed him; and had there again the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he aſſayed again to make way by force to his brother. So he paſſed onward, and came again to Venuſia, having Nero ſtill at his heels. Thence went he over the River Aufidus, to Canuſium; where he ſat down, not far from the place in which he had obtained his moſt memorable Victory. There alſo did Nero ſit down by him: and both of them reſted, without making offer to fight. It ſeemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well, that his brother might, with little impediment, overcome the way to Canuſium: where if he could once again deal with both the Conſuls, and all the Roman Forces together, he had reaſon to hope for ſuch another Victory, as once he had gotten in the ſame open Countrey. If this had ſo fallen out, Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians ſhould not have needed to wiſh any ſecond Victory, in the naked Champans about Cannæ; if ſuch an Army, as this which Aſdrubal now brings, had come to ſecond Hannibal, when he was in his full ſtrength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reaſon afterward to ſay, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the ſupply, did beat him out of Italy; which elſe no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilſt Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was coming to their ſuccour: he was advertiſed of Aſdrubal his approach; by Letters and Meſſengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. Theſe gave notice, that Aſdrubal had left the Siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithſtanding all oppoſition that could be made by Livy the Conſul. Of theſe news Claudius Nero was nothing joyful. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Aſdrubal brought with him: it was moſt apparent, that howſoever the fortune of Rome ſhould avoid, for the preſent, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of ſo ſtrong a War at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithful Aſſociates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he reſolved, that it were better to make any deſperate adventure, than to ſuffer the conjunction of two ſuch malevolent Planets: whoſe peſtilent influence, if not on the ſudden, yet within few years, was like to work moſt lamentable effect. It ſeemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to ſtay the progreſs of Aſdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readineſs, that could do ſervice in ſuch a needful caſe; excepting thoſe that were already employed under the two Conſuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himſelf to his own charge, which was the War againſt Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where more neceſſity required; and to carry part of his Forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet ſince the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was far more dangerous to the Roman Commonwealth; it ſeemed the beſt way to put Fortune in truſt with that which was of the leſs importance. Six thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making ſhew, as if he would only ſtep aſide, to do ſome ſmall piece of ſervice near at hand; away he poſted as faſt as he could, to aſſiſt his fellow-Conſul. His Meſſengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to paſs, that they ſhould be ready to meet him, with Victuals, and all other neceſſaries for his Army. Livius, the other Conſul, at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Aſdrubal within half a mile of him. In ſix days Nero had finiſhed his journey thither; and when he drew near, ſent Meſſengers before him, to give notice of his coming. Livy thought it fitteſt that he ſhould ſtay in ſome place of covert until dark night, and then enter ſecretly into the Camp: leſt the Enemy, perceiving this acceſs of ſtrength, ſhould accordingly frame his counſels. This was done: and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, as well Horſe as Foot, that Nero had brought with him, ſhould be lodged and entertained by men of their own ſort. Their Company was ſomewhat encreaſed by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Nevertheleſs, it was not needful, that the Quarter which received them, ſhould be enlarged, ſince they had brought with them nothing but their Arms. The next day they held a Counſel of War: wherein ſome were of opinion, that it was beſt for theſe new-arrived Companies, to refreſh themſelves a few days after their weary journey, before they ſhould be drawn forth to battel. But againſt this, Nero was very earneſt: and beſought his Colleague, to make uſe of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own Camp, ere Hannibal ſhould have notice of his abſence. The Souldiers alſo of Nero, were full of Spirit; perceiving that the honour of the Victory was like to be theirs: foraſmuch as the battel would not have been undertaken, without this their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Counſel brake up, that the ſign of battel ſhould be hung out; which was commonly a Purple Coat over the General's Pavillion.

Aſdrubal was no leſs willing than the Romans to come to battel: having long deſired it, and hitherto not found occaſion before. But when he had put his Men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance; it ſeemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and ſome of their Arms and Horſes, looked as though they had wanted dreſſing, after a long journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the Camp: and gave order, that if no Priſoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet ſhould there good obſervation be made, whether the Enemies Camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might ſhew their Forces to be increaſed. The Camp, as hath been ſaid, was not extended: but the Trumpet, that ſounded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Prætor, did now, contrary to former cuſtom, ſound twice in the quarter of Livius the Conſul. Hereat Aſdrubal greatly muſed: and being well acquainted with the Roman Orders; held this for a ſure token, that the other Conſul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good caſe, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the beſt way, to go leiſurely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own Forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himſelf perhaps with over-ſtrongly fortifying his own Camp. Yet when he now perceived, that ſomewhat was fallen out beſide his expectation; he changed his reſolution; and held it no diſhonour to remove a little further off. So he diſlodged ſecretly by night: intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keep himſelf as long as he could, from neceſſity of battel. But whether it were ſo, that his guides did ſteal away from him in the dark, ſo that he could not find the way to the Foords; or whether his Carriages were too heavy, and hindred his ſpeed: far he had not gone, ere the Conſul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman Horſe, and ſtayed him from paſſing any further. Soon after came L. Porcius with the light Armature: whom the other Conſul followed anon with all the Legions, in good order, and ready for battel. Aſdrubal, ſeeing himſelf overtaken with neceſſity to fight, omitted no care and circumſpection. His Gaules, in whom he repoſed leaſt confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy ſhould not, without much difficulty, be able to climb: in the right wing he ſtood himſelf, with his Africans and Spaniards: his Ligurians he placed in the midſt; and his Elephants he beſtowed in the front of his battels. On the Roman ſide, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battel. Both Romans and Carthaginians well underſtood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of ſafety there was unto the vanquiſhed. Only the Romans herein ſeemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; That they were to fight with men deſirous to have fled from them. And, according to this preſumption, came Livius the Conſul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans: by whom he was ſo ſharply entertained, that the Victory ſeemed very doubtful. The Africans and Spaniards were ſtout Souldiers; and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians alſo were a hardy Nation, and not accuſtomed to give ground; which they needed the leſs, or were able now to do, being placed in the midſt. Livius therefore, and Porcius, found ſtrong oppoſition: and with great ſlaughter on both ſides, prevailed little or nothing. Beſides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their firſt ranks; and put them in ſuch diſorder, as the Roman Enſigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain againſt a ſteep Hill, was unable to come to blows with the Gaules, that ſtood oppoſite unto him, but out of danger. This made Aſdrubal the more confident; who ſeeing his own left wing ſafe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impreſſion on the other ſide, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he ſtood, was ſuch as would compel him to remain idle till the fight were ended, took a part of his Forces, and led them round behind the the Forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compaſſed, he fell upon Aſdrubal, and charged him in the Flank. Here began the Victory to be manifeſt on the Roman ſide. For Nero, finding none to reſiſt him in Front, ran all along the depth of Aſdrubal his battel: and falling upon the Skirts thereof, diſordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every ſide, the greateſt part was ſlain. The Ligurians and Gaules eſcaped as they could: and ſaved themſelves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, four were taken alive: the reſt were ſlain; ſome by the Enemies Weapons, others by their own Guides that rode them. For when any of them, being ſore wounded, began to wax unruly, and ruſh back upon their own battels following them: the guide had in readineſs a Mallet, and a Chizzel, wherewith he gave them a ſtroke between the Ears, in the joynt of the neck, next unto the head; wherewith he killed the beaſt upon the ſudden. This ſpeedy way of preventing ſuch harm as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the Squadrons following them, is ſaid to have been the Device of Aſdrubal himſelf; who died in this Battel.

Great commendations are given to Aſdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Livy. He is ſaid at all times to have ſhewed himſelf worthy of Amilcar his Father, and Hannibal his Brother; to have ſtriven with great patience, againſt many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the means of thoſe Captains that were ſent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this laſt battel all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he ſaw the loſs irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickeſt of his Enemies; where fighting bravely, he was ſlain. Of the number that died with him in this battel, the report of Livy, and of Polybius, do very much diſagree. For Livy ſaith, that the Carthaginians had no leſs an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Cannæ; that fifty ſix thouſand of them were ſlain, five thouſand and four hundred taken Priſoners, and above four thouſand Roman Citizens, whom they had Captives with them, delivered, and ſet at liberty. He ſaith alſo, that of the Romans and their Aſſociates, there were ſlain eight thouſand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and ſilver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have been as rich as Livy reporteth it; for Aſdrubal came well ſtored with money. But Polybius (who had no deſire to make this battel of Metaurus a parallel unto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thouſand of the Carthaginian ſide, and two thouſand of the Roman to have been ſlain. The number of the Priſoners he doth not mention: but only ſaith, That ſome of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the reſt died in the battel. Whereby it may ſeem, that they were all Barchines: foraſmuch as they preferred the honour of themſelves, and of their Countrey, above their lives.

The joy of this Victory was no leſs in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever ſince it was known in what ſort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it ſtrange, that the Conſul ſhould make ſuch a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman Forces, unto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal ſhould chance to have notice of this his departure; and either purſue him, or ſet upon the Army that ſtayed behind, much weakned, and without a General? Thus did they talk: yet reſerving their cenſure unto the ſucceſs, with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the iſſue. In the mean while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ran to the Temples, with Vows and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in Counſel, waiting ſtill ready at hand upon the Magiſtrates: as if ſome great matter were likely to fall out, that would require every ones help. In brief, they were all ſo full of Melancholly, that when firſt news of the Victory came, there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Meſſengers arrived from the Conſuls, with Letters containing all that had paſſed: there was not only great and joyful concourſe of all ſorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private buſineſs; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) and attending their own affairs in ſuch wiſe, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his Camp, threw forth openly the head of Aſdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African Priſoners bound; ſent two of them looſe to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. Theſe two Priſoners might have ſerved well enough to certifie Hannibal of this miſadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Aſdrubal: eſpecially ſince Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given burial to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whoſe Carkaſſes fell into his hands. But it may ſeem, that howſoever the People of Carthage, wanted much of the generous diſpoſition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Commonweal; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were far more civil, and leſs prone to the inſolency of revenge. The beſt Excuſe of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the ſudden terror of ſuch a Spectacle, than by the ſimple relation of that which had paſſed, to make a deep impreſſion of fear into the Carthaginians. It may alſo be ſaid, That he forgot himſelf, being over-joyed with the greatneſs of his proſperity. For it was the battel of Metaurus that weighed down the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the loweſt Ebb, ceaſed not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having loſt in this unhappy fight (beſides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that ſo long ſuſtained him in Italy, withdrew himſelf into the Countrey of the Brutians: and thither he cauſed all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewiſe all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend ſo many places as he held at the preſent, becauſe they lay too far aſunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a leſſer compaſs in the utmoſt corner of Italy; it being a Countrey of much faſtneſs, and the people exceedingly devoted to his ſervice. In this buſineſs Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either becauſe Hannibal was too ſtrong for him, having all his Forces united; or becauſe it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their Harveſt was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius, the other Conſul, tarried among the Ciſalpine Gaules, until the end of Summer; there to ſet things in ſuch order as he thought requiſite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cauſe, he deſired leave to return home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well underſtood his meaning: which was to have the honour of a Triumph, as he well deſerved. But foraſmuch as it was well known, what intereſt Nero had in the late Victory: order was given, that not only Livy, with his Army, ſhould come home; but likewiſe Nero; though leaving his Army behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of Triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof Livy made the greater ſhew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; becauſe in his Province, and upon his day of command, the Victory was gotten; his Army alſo being preſent at the Triumph. But Nero, that rode on Horſeback, and without ſuch attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers: by whom, the Victory was in a manner wholly aſcribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgment of their good ſervice. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be choſen Conſuls: and Conſuls they were choſen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory, in their Conſulſhip. Neither indeed from this year, which was the Thirteenth of the preſent War, until the Eighteenth year, wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; ſave only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by ſurpriſe. For Hannibal wanted ſtrength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little mind to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himſelf upright. And ſurely very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius; whom Livy therein follows: That making War upon a People, of all other the moſt warlike, he obtained ſo many Victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of ſo many ſundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greeks, which were, neither in Language, Laws, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in ſuch good order, that they never fell to Sedition among themſelves, or againſt their General. But that which Livy adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he ſuſtained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry ſoil of the Brutians: which, when it was beſt manured in time of peace, could hardly ſuffice to nouriſh the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Army in ſuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatneſs of reward and booty: ſince after the death of Aſdrubal, he made no invaſion upon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himſelf ſtill among the poor Brutians. Where we muſt leave him until he be drawn into Africk by Scipio; whoſe doings will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conqueſt of Spain.

I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Iſle of Gades.

MAGO, and Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Aſdrubal, the Son of Amilcar, departed thence into Italy. Theſe agreed together, that Mago ſhould make a Voyage to the Baleares; there to levy a ſupply of men: and Aſdrubal withdraw himſelf into Luſitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in thoſe parts. Mago had ſoon ended his buſineſs, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the ſame perhaps that had lately been employed in Sicil) who brought new Forces out of Africk, and came to ſucceed in place of Aſdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furniſhed with men, and all things needful from Carthage; when that Son of Amilcar, whoſe authority had been greateſt, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it ſelf, againſt that noble race of Warriors; when it ſhould appear, that things did proſper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon deſire to make good ſome ſuch opinion raiſed of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno took the Field, and led Mago with him; as purpoſing afreſh to ſet upon the Romans. So he entred into the Countrey of the Celtiberians, not very far from New Carthage: where, by Money, and other perſwaſions, he levied above nine thouſand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himſelf in the Eaſtern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may ſeem, to the proceedings of Aſdrubal, the Son of Amilcar; againſt whom, he is reported by ſome Writers, to have ſent part of his Forces into Italy, to the aſſiſtance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius, the Conſuls. But hearing of the levy made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he ſent M. Syllanus, the Proprætor, with ten thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe. Syllanus got intelligence by ſome Fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countreymen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great diſorder: as men fearing no danger, becauſe they were at home. Wherefore as cloſely as he was able, he drew near to theſe Celtiberians: and falling upon them on the ſudden, gave them ſuch an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their ſuccour, inſtead of heartning and re-enforcing them, became partakers of the loſs. Mago ſaved himſelf, with all the Horſe, and old Companies of Foot, which were about two thouſand: and in ten days journey brought them ſafe to Adrubal. The reſt of the Africans were either ſlain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken Priſoner; though he kept himſelf out of the fight until all was loſt. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make ſhift; and ſaved moſt of themſelves by running into the Woods.

It could no otherwiſe be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy ſtood, ſtood, by the coming thither of Aſdrubal. Ten thouſand Foot, and Eighteen hundred Horſe, he did therefore ſend out of Spain (as it is reported by ſome Authors) to the defence of his own Countrey: or was perhaps about to ſend them; and thereupon remained at New Carthage, intentive to the neceſſity and ſucceſs of his Countreymen at home. But when he had word of the great Victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conqueſt of Spain; which muſt needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of ſuch an overthrow. The Spaniſh Souldiers that ſerved under Hannibal, and thoſe that had been ſent over into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrey was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noiſed abroad, That all which had followed Aſdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal, with his Army, was cloſed up in a ſtreight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themſelves unto the Will of the Victors. That it was the ſucceſs of things in Italy, which gave ſuch confidence unto Scipio, it is the more probable, becauſe he took not this great Enterpriſe in hand, until the Summer was almoſt ſpent. Aſdrubal therefore uſed the benefit of the ſeaſon; and by diſpoſing his Army into many Garriſons; hindred the Enemy from doing any great Exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, cauſed Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother, L. Scipio, took by aſſault the Town of Oringis.

Againſt the next years danger, Aſdrubal prepared a great Army: and ſpared not coſt, nor travel in ſtrengthning himſelf, for the trial of his laſt fortune in Spain. With ſeventy thouſand Foot, four thouſand Horſe, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the Field: which number I believe that he could hardly have raiſed, without boldly denying the truth of thoſe reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with ſuch a Multitude. Wherefore he judged it needful to uſe the help of his Spaniſh friends. But the Death of his Father and Uncle, that were caſt away by the Treaſon of ſuch falſe Auxiliaries; made him on the other ſide very doubtful, of relying upon thoſe, that might perhaps betray him in his greateſt need. Yet ſince one Colchas, that was Lord of Eight and twenty Towns, had promiſed him the laſt Winter; to raiſe three thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe for his ſervice: he reſolved to make uſe of thoſe, and ſome few others, that might help to make a ſhew, and yet not be able to do great harm; if they would revolt. So with five and forty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, he ſought out the Enemy; near to whom he incamped. At his firſt coming, Mago and Maſaniſſa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilſt he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain Troops of Horſe in covert: which breaking upon them unexpected, cauſed them to fall off. They made at firſt an orderly Retreat: but being more hardly preſſed, they ſhortly betook themſelves to plain flight. After this Encounter, which added ſome courage to the Romans, and abated the preſumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmiſhes between the Horſe, and light Armature, on both ſides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Aſdrubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to ſhew that he durſt fight; yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many days: Aſdrubal being ſtill the firſt that iſſued forth in the morning; and the firſt that, in the evening, withdrew himſelf into his Trenches. The Spaniſh Auxiliaries were placed on both ſides in the Wings; the Carthaginians were in the midſt, with their Elephants before them; and oppoſite to theſe on the other ſide were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at far diſtance, many days together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they ſhould ſhortly meet in the ſame form; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before deſigned. But Scipio, when he purpoſed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withal, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He cauſed his Men, and Horſes, to be well fed betimes in the morning, before day: and then ſent forth his Horſe and light Armature, to train out the Carthaginians, with their bellies empty: uſing herein the ſame trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his Father in the battel of Trebia. His Roman Legions he beſtowed in the Wings; his Spaniards in the battel. Aſdrubal ſent forth his Horſe in all haſte, to entertain the Romans; whilſt he himſelf arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmiſhes of the Horſe it could not be diſcerned which part had the better: ſince being over-preſſed on either ſide, they had a ſafe Retreat unto their Foot; and one Troop ſeconding another by courſe, returned to charge. This Fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: becauſe his Men, having well fed themſelves, were like to hold out better than the Enemy. But about noon he cauſed his Wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battel of Spaniards far behind them; that came on leiſurely, according to direction. The Spaniſh Mercinaries, that ſtood in Aſdrubal his Wings, were no way comparable, ſave only in number, to the Latin and Roman Souldiers, that came againſt them; for they were freſh Souldiers, levied in haſte; and fighting only in reſpect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the ſame time, by the Roman Velites, and by ſome cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the ſame purpoſe: they were ſorely preſſed; and with much difficulty made reſiſtance. The Carthaginians would fain have ſuccoured them; but that they durſt not ſtir out of their places, becauſe of the Spaniſh battel which was coming againſt them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the beſt part of Aſdrubal his Army ſtood idle, until the Wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he muſt have caſt himſelf into the open ſpace that lay before him, between the Roman Wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he ſhould have found himſelf incloſed in ſuch ſort, as was the Conſul Paulus at the battel of Cannæ. Wherefore he did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with Wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or thoſe perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In proceſs of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreſhed their bodies in the morning, endured luſty; when the others began to faint with travel, and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gave not over, till they had forc'd the Enemy to change his pace, and run from him. Aſdrubal did his beſt to have made an orderly Retreat; and afterward again, to have cauſed his men to turn head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not ſuffer the Victory to be ſo extorted from them: neither was it eaſie to put freſh courage into the vanquiſhed; led by the obſtinate paſſion of fear, which hearkens to no perſwaſion. The Camp of Aſdrubal had that day been taken, if a ſtorm of Rain, which fell violently on the ſudden, and bred ſome ſuperſtition in the Romans, had not cauſed them to give over.

The ſame night, Aſdrubal gave no reſt to his men: but cauſed them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the Camp; wherein he feared to be aſſaulted. But little aſſurance could he have in the ſtrength of his Trenches, when he had loſt the hearts of his Spaniſh Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his Subjects: many followed this Example; and ſoon after, two ſtrong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garriſons betrayed. It ſeems, that the perverſe fortune of this late battel, whereupon Aſdrubal had ſet his reſt; bred in the Spaniards a diſpoſition, to believe the more eaſily thoſe reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Aſdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himſelf, and marched away, faſter than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning: and overtaking the Carthaginians with his Horſe, cauſed them ſo often to make ſtand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruel ſlaughter: for there was no reſiſtance made, but all fell to rout, ſave only ſeven thouſand, that with Aſdrubal himſelf, recovered a very ſtrong piece of ground, which they fortified in haſte. This place he made ſhift a while to defend: but wanting there neceſſaries to ſuſtain himſelf long, he was forſaken by ſome of thoſe few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he reſolved to make ſhift for one: and ſtealing from his Company by night away to the Seaſide, that was not far thence; he took ſhipping, and ſet ſail for Gades. When Scipio underſtood that Aſdrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, to beſiege their Camp (which was not taken in haſte; for Mago and Maſaniſſa ſtayed in it) whilſt he with the reſt of the Army, did what was needful in the Countrey abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Maſaniſſa followed Aſdrubal to Gades: and their Army diſperſed it ſelf; ſome flying over to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa, that made countenance of War againſt the Romans: of which only Caſtulo had in it a Carthaginian Garriſon; conſiſting of ſuch as had ſaved themſelves by flight, in the late overthrows. Hereby it ſeems, that the report of thoſe Hiſtorians was ill grounded, who ſaid, that Caſtulo yielded long ſince unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a Wife in that City. For this was one of the laſt three Towns that held out, on the Carthaginian ſide. Illiturgi had ſometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the Death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earneſtly the Carthaginian fortune; it not only rebelled; but with great cruelty betrayed, and ſlew the poor men that eſcaped thither from the overthrows. Aſtapa was a Town that had ſtill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worſe, had thriven by ſpoil of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not until the next year) Scipio went againſt theſe, and took himſelf Illiturgi and Caſtulo: Illiturgi by aſſault, and with a general ſlaughter of the Inhabitants; Caſtulo, by Treaſon of one Cerdubellus. Aſtapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather deſtroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raiſed in the Market-place: whereinto was thrown all the gold and ſilver, with whatſoever elſe was precious; the women and children ſtanding by it under a ſure guard; that ſhould kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This proviſion being made: all the Inhabitants that could bear arms, ruſhed forth deſperately: and fell upon the Roman Camp; where ſtriving beyond their power, they were every one ſlain. Then was the Town forthwith ſet on fire, by thoſe that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans conſumed with the flame; whilſt they ruſhed over-haſtily to catch the gold and ſilver, which they ſaw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Aſdrubal, being beaten into the Iſland of Gades, found no cauſe of long ſtay there: but returned home to Carthage, with ſeven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occaſion, if any ſhould be offered. He viſited in his way home, Syphax, King of the Maſæſili, a people of the Numidians, hoping to win him to the friendſhip of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the ſame time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethink himſelf, how to finiſh the War, by putting them to the like diſtreſs in Africk. Hereunto it ſeemed, that the help of Sypax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and ſuſtained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eaſily be moved to ſeek revenge. He had alſo been beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that ſent him over a Captain into Africk; who inſtructed him ſo well in marſhalling his Forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon theſe reaſons the Numidian King ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, and made League with the City, in a time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africk; upon the friendſhip of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cauſe he ſent over C. Lælius his Embaſſador, to deal with Syphax: who declaring, that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to do in Spain; eaſily perſwaded the King to take part with thoſe that had the better, and were without queſtion his better friends. Only Syphax requeſted, that the Roman General ſhould viſit him in perſon, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condeſcended; thinking the friendſhip of ſo great a King, that was Neighbour to Carthage, and not far diſtant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he took Sea: and arrived in the Kings Port, at the ſame time, with Aſdrubal. This would have been very dangerous to him, had he been diſcried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven, they forbare to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; ſeeing at one time, two ſuch Captains of two moſt powerful Cities, came to deſire his friendſhip.

He

He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excuſed himſelf, by want of ſuch commiſſion from the Senate. He feaſted them together: and ſhortly diſmiſſed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

†. II.

Funeral Games held by Scipio. A Duel between two Spaniſh Princes. A Digreſſion, concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spain, and reſting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon thoſe of Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa, as hath been ſaid before. The Conqueſt of the Countrey being then in a manner at an end: he performed at New Carthage, with great ſolemnity, ſome Vows that he had made; and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with Funeral games, eſpecially of thoſe that fought at Sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needful, that he ſhould trouble himſelf with preparing Slaves for that ſpectacle, to hazard their lives, as was uſed in the City of Rome: for there were enough, that either offered themſelves as Voluntaries, or were ſent from their Princes, to give proof in ſingle combat, of the valour that was in their ſeveral Countries. Some alſo there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwiſe end, agreed to refer the deciſion of their Controverſies, to trial of the Sword, in ſingle fight. Among theſe, the moſt eminent, were, Corbis, and Orſua, Couſin-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brother's Son: wherefore he claimed the Lordſhip, as eldeſt of the Houſe, after the manner of our Iriſh Taniſtry. But the Father of Orſua ſtood lately ſeized of the Principality: which though himſelf received by the Death of his elder brother; yet this his Son would not let it go back; but claimed to hold it as Heir unto his Father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they anſwered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vain, to take up that quarrel; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battel, ſhould be Umpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was alſo the ſtronger, and more skillful at his Weapon, eaſily vanquiſhed the fool-hardineſs of the younger.

Such Combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the War of Troy, by Theſeus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as alſo of two at the War of Troy; the one between Paris and Menelaus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want there Examples of them among the Hebrews: whereof that between David and Goliah; and others performed by ſome of David's Worthies, againſt thoſe that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Unto the ſame kind appertains the fight, between twelve of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Benjamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, againſt the three brethren Curiatij, that were Albans. The Combat of Manlius Torquatus, and ſhortly after, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of leſs importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought, between Edmond Ironſide and Canutus the Dane, for no leſs than the Kingdom. The uſe of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almoſt upon every occaſion, great or ſmall. In the Reign of Edward the Third, who ſuſtained the party of Mountfort againſt the Earl of Bloys, contending for the Dutchy of Britain; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, between Thirty of the Britains, and Thirty Engliſh: two of which Engliſh, were Calverly, a brave Captain, and that Sir Robert Knolles; who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French Wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is deſcended. It were infinite to reckon the Examples of the like, found in Engliſh, French, and Italian Hiſtories. Moſt of them have been Combats of bravery, and of gayeté de cure, as the French term it; for honour of ſeveral Nations; for love of Miſtreſſes; or whatſoever elſe gave occaſion unto men, deſirous to ſet out themſelves. But beſides thoſe of this ſort, there are two other natures of Combats; which are, either upon accuſation for life; or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of Right. And of this latter kind was that, of which we ſpake even now, between Corbis and Orſua. Unto theſe (methinks) may be added, as of different condition from the reſt, the Combat upon Wager; ſuch as were that between David and Goliah; or that between the Horatij and Curiatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accuſation for life, there was a Combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Boulinbrook, Duke of Hereford, and Moubray, Duke of Norfolk. There was a Combat performed by Sir John Anſley, and one Cattrington: whom Anſley charged with Treaſon; and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henry of Eſſex. The like alſo between a Navarrois, and one Welch, of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accuſed of Treaſon: but, being beaten in fight, confeſſed that he had belied him; and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our trial by battel do determine, that the falſe accuſer, if he be vanquiſhed, ſhall ſuffer the puniſhment which had been due to the offender, if the accuſation had been proved, I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accuſed of Treaſon, or, according to the Cuſtoms of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences puniſhed by Death) be overcome, he ſhall ſuffer the pains appointed for thoſe Crimes. In Combats for trial of Right, it is not ſo: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in perſon, but he may try it by his Champion; as did Paramor and Lowe, or offered to do, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this caſe, he that is beaten, or yieldeth, loſeth only his cauſe, not his life. Neither are the Combats, upon accuſation, or trial of right, fought in open field, as are thoſe of bravery; but in campe cloſe; that is, within Rails. Now this trial by Combat was ſo ordinary in France, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the fair, his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his own Juriſdiction. And it ſeemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by conſent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties ſhould pay two ſhillings ſix pence; but if it were performed, then ſhould the party vanquiſhed forfeit an hundred and twelve ſhillings. And upon this Cuſtom grew the French Proverb, which they uſe when any man hath had an hard or unjuſt judgment; ſaying, that he was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of theſe frequent trials by battel, that great learned man Yuo, Biſhop of Chartres, did often complain, and ſpecially againſt the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Biſhop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert, Arch-biſhop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgment of their Churches, that had ratified ſuch Challenges of Combat. But this liberty, and kind of trial, was retrencht by Saint Lewes, and Philip the fair; ſo that no man ſhould decree, or grant it, ſave the King himſelf. It hath ſince been granted, though more ſparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carouges againſt Jaques le Gris; and to Julian Romero, the Spaniard, againſt Moro, his Countreyman: wherein Sir Henry Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now living, was Patron to Romero, that had the Victory, and laſtly to the Lord of Chaſt. Now in thoſe Challenges, upon accuſation of Treaſon, Murder, or other offence deſerving death, (and in thoſe only) the Rule held; That le defendeur eſtoit tenu de propoſer ces deffenſes per une dementir; The Defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuſer the Lie: otherwiſe it was concluded, that the Defendant did taiſiblement confeſſer le crime; ſilently confeſs the crime. But after ſuch time as Francis the French King, upon ſome diſpute about breach of Faith, had ſent the Lie unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to a perſonal Combat: every petty Champion in France, in imitation of their Maſter, made the giving of the Lie Mortality it ſelf; holding it a matter of no ſmall glory, to have it ſaid, That the meaneſt Gentleman in France, would not put up, what the great Emperor, Charles the fift, had patiently endured.

* clerici veſtri nuper ad nos revertentes, qui cauſæ Comitis Theobaldi Aurelianis interfuerunt, retulerunt nobis, quod quidam miles Domini Rodulphi quendam militem Comitis ad Monomachiam provocaverit, & hanc provocationem Eccleſiæ veſtræ judicio confirmaverit, &c.

From this beginning is derived a Challenge of Combat, grounded upon none of thoſe occaſions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Trial of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital Offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half ſo many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter ſeeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duelliſts. So that in theſe days, wherein every man takes unto himſelf a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint perſonal Combats; the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accuſations for life, is become the moſt fruitful root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word ſo terrible, and a wrong ſo unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the faſhion, taken up in haſte by the French Gentlemen after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a Cuſtom: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philoſophy of quarrel; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea, there are (among many other no leſs ridiculous) ſome ſo myſtical curioſities herein, as that it is held, a far greater diſhonour, to receive from an Enemy a ſlight touch with a Cane, than a ſound blow with a Sword: the one, having relation to a Slave; the other to a Souldier. I confeſs, that the difference is pretty: though, for mine own part, if I had had any ſuch Italionated Enemy in former times, I ſhould willingly have made with him ſuch an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions, who are commonly, of all other, the moſt tender in receiving it. I ſay, that the moſt of theſe, who preſent death on the points of their Swords to all that give it them; uſe nothing ſo much in their converſation and courſe of life, as to ſpeak and ſwear falſly. Yea, it is thereby, that they ſhift and ſhuffle in the World, and abuſe it. For how few are there among them, which, having aſſumed, and ſworn to pay the Monies, and other things they borrow, do not break their word and promiſe, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Liers by Record, by being ſued in ſome Court or other of Juſtice, upon breach of Word, or Bond? For he which hath promiſed, that he will pay Money by a day; or promiſed any thing elſe, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promiſe hath been made. Nay, what is the profeſſion of love that men make now-a-days? What is the vowing of their ſervice, and of all they have, uſed in their ordinary Complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid but good morrow, or ſalute, other than a courteous and courtlike kind of lying? It is (ſaith a wiſe Frenchman, deriding therein the Apiſh Cuſtom of his Countrey) une marché & complot fait enſemble the ſe moequer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kind of Merchandiſe, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and d ride each other: and ſo far now a-days in faſhion, and in uſe; as he that uſeth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynical. True it is notwithſtanding (omitting the old diſtinctions) that there is great difference between theſe mannerly and complemental lies, with thoſe which are ſometime perſwaded by neceſſity upon breach of promiſe; and thoſe which men uſe out of cowardize and fear: the latter confeſſing themſelves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a Vice, of all other, ſtiled the moſt villainous. But now for the Lie it ſelf, as it is made the ſubject of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I ſay, That who ſo gives another man the Lie, when it is manifeſt that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more heinouſly taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promiſe which he hath otherwiſe made. For he that promiſeth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promiſed, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himſelf a Liar. On the other ſide, He that gives any man the Lie, when himſelf knows, that he, to whom it is given, hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himſelf. And what cauſe have I, if I ſay, that the Sun ſhines, when it doth ſhine, and that another fellow tells me, I lie, for it's mid-night; to proſecute ſuch an one to death, for making himſelf a fooliſh Ruffian, and a Liar in his own knowledg? For he that gives the Lie in any other diſpute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life, gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreme rudeneſs to tax any man in publick with an untruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice againſt whom the untruth is uttered) but all that is rude, ought not to be civilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French Cuſtom, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counſel of

of God. But you will ſay, That theſe diſcourſes ſavour of cowardize. It is true, if you call it cowardize, to fear God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wiſe, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing elſe to be feared. For againſt an Enemies Sword we ſhall find ten thouſand Seven-penny-men (waged at that price in the Wars) that fear it as little, and perchance leſs, than any profeſt Sword-man in the World. Diligentiſſima in tutela ſui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preſerver of it ſelf. It is (ſaith Ariſtotle) a mediocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna: ſic nec fortem pugna; ſed cauſa: As it is not the puniſhment that makes the Martyr; ſo it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cauſe. In which whoſoever ſhall reſolvedly end his life, reſolvedly in reſpect of the cauſe, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as he may juſtly be numbred among the Martyrs of God; ſo may thoſe that die with malicious hearts, in private Combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devil. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or puniſh the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conqueſt of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cauſe to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our own conſciences; animaſq; in vulnere ponere; And to drown our Souls in the Wounds and Blood of our Enemies. Hereupon you wil again ask me, if I condemn in generous and noble Spirits the defence of their honours, being preſt with injuries? I ſay, that I do not; if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternal Law: and the Laws of all Chriſtian Kings and States, do favour him that is aſſailed, in the ſlaughter of the Aſſailant. You will ſecondly ask me, Whether a Noble man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel, by one of like quality, be not bound, in point of honour, to ſatisfie the challenger in private Combat? I anſwer, that he is not: becauſe (omitting the greateſt, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and oppoſite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can deſtroy it; except you will ſtile thoſe Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, ſeeing the Laws of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to ſecond the Conqueror; and the Laws of God appointed the Devil to ſecond the conquered dying in malice: I ſay, that he is both baſe, and a fool, that accepts of any Cartel ſo accompanied. To this perchance it will be anſwered, That the Kings of England, and other Chriſtian Kings, have ſeldom taken any ſuch advantage over men of quality; who upon even terms have ſlain their private Enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combuſtion they have not often done it; ſo did our Noble men and Gentlemen in former Ages, in all important injuries, ſue unto the King, to approve themſelves by battel and publick combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law: ſo did they diſdain to ſubmit themſelves to the ſhameful revenge thereof; the ſame revenge (becauſe it deteſteth Murder) that it hath declared againſt a common Cut-purſe, or other Thieves. Nay, let it be granted that a Pardon be procured for ſuch offenders; yet is not the Man-ſlayer freed by his Pardon. For theſe two remedies hath the party grieved notwithſtanding; that is, to require juſtice by Grand-Aſſize, or by Battel, upon his Appeal, which (ſaith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further ſaith (for I uſe his own words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-ſlayer) be convinced either by Great Aſſize, or by Battel, upon that Appeal; the Man-ſlayer ſhall die, notwithſtanding the Princes Pardon. So favourable (ſaith the ſame learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realm, to Juſtice, and to the puniſhment of blood violently ſhed. It may further be demanded, how our Noblemen and Gentlemen ſhall be repaired in Honour, where an Enemy, taking the ſtart either in words or blows, ſhall lay on them an infamy unſufferable? I ſay, that a Marſhal's Court will eaſily give ſatisfaction in both. And if we hold it no diſgrace to ſubmit our ſelves, for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands and for all things elſe, by which the lives of our ſelves, our Wives, and Children, are ſuſtained, to the Judges of the Law; becauſe it may be Fellony, to take by violence even that which is our own: why ſhould we not ſubmit our ſelves to the Judges of Honour in caſes of Honour; becauſe to recover our reputation by ſtrong hand, may be Murder? But yet again it may be objected, That the loſs of Honour ought to be more fearful unto us, than either the loſs of our Goods, of our Lands, or of our Lives; and I ſay ſo too. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be ſo dear unto us, other than a kind of hiſtory, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publick good? In theſe he that is imployed and truſted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other baſe affection; it is true that he loſeth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private reſpect, and moſt commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue; becauſe it is contrary to the law of God, and of all Chriſtian Kings: neither is it difficult, becauſe even and equal in perſons and arms: Neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; becauſe the loſs or mutilation of an able man, is alſo a loſs to the Commonweal.

Now that a Marſhal of England hath power to ſave every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may ſuſtain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For to repent us of any ill words that we have given, and to confeſs that we have done him wrong to whom we have given them, is a ſufficient ſatisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than ſufficient. For he that gives ill words in choller, and ſuddenly denies them, or repents himſelf of them upon adviſement; hath the diſadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blows, which are indeed not to be given but to thoſe that are ſervile, whether ſufficient recompence will be made for them, it ſhall appear by a notable Example of a moſt worthy Gentleman, Mounſieur du Pleſſis, that was ſtricken in France not long ſince, by a Baron of the ſame Nation. The ſatisfaction which was given him by a judgment of the Conſtable, and Marſhals of France, was this: In the open Court, wherein the Conſtable gave judgment, M. de Pleſſis was ſet in a Chair under the degrees where the Conſtable and Marſhals ſate: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a Sword, with the point towards himſelf, and in his left hand the like Cudgel, or Baſtinado, wherewith he had ſtricken M. de Pleſſis; both which Weapons he delivered into Pleſſis hands, ſubmitting himſelf to ſuch revenge, as it ſhould pleaſe him to take with either of thoſe Weapons; the Conſtable and Marſhals having formerly left it to the will of Pleſſis to uſe his own diſcretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reaſon to pleaſe himſelf, as one before-hand in point of honour, who ſtruck M. de Pleſſis, like a Ruffian, coming behind him, and (having advantage of company, and his Horſes ready) ſhifted himſelf away on the ſudden; but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himſelf in this ſhameful manner; or whether Monſieur de Pleſſis (of whoſe valour no man doubted) had not far juſter cauſe to reſt ſatisfied, ſince he might at his pleaſure have beaten or wounded his Enemy, but forgave him; let any wiſe man judg. To this if it be ſaid, That the Baron was conſtrained to make his ſubmiſſion; that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no diſgrace unto him: I anſwer, that one may ſay as well, that it is no diſgrace to a Thief, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, becauſe his repentance alſo is conſtrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no diſgrace, in reſpect of the force, but in reſpect of the fact: which (but for our ſins to God) makes all repentance ſhameful; becauſe all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for ſomewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honeſt man. Nay, voluntary repentance it ſelf, as it hath relation to men, ariſeth either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgment of our own weakneſs. Certainly, as wiſe men, and valiant men, do rather deride petty injuries, or ſudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: ſo men, apt to quarrel, do commonly ſuſpect their own valour; and rather deſire, that thereby the World ſhould believe them to be of great daring, than know any ſuch reſolution in themſelves. For he that knows himſelf indeed to be a valiant man, ſcorns to hunt after the opinion.

Now the ſame power which the Conſtable and Marſhals of France have, hath alſo a Marſhal of England, or his Deputies; by whoſe judgment, in all diſputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preſerved; we may therefore as well ſubmit our ſelves to the Judges of honour, in all diſputes of honour, as we do ſubmit our ſelves in all controverſies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the inſtitution of this Court of Chivalry in England, in France, and elſewhere, was no leſs charitable than politick. For the blood of man, violently ſpilt, doth not bring forth Honey-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which ſting but the fingers, or the face: but it produceth that monſtrous Beaſt, Revenge; which hath ſtung to Death, and eaten up of ſeveral Nations, ſo many noble Perſonages, as there is nothing more lamentable; nor more threatning the Wrath of God upon ſupreme Governors, than the permiſſion.

His Majeſty therefore (which Henry the Fourth of France alſo endeavoured) hath done a moſt Kingly and Chriſtian-like deed in Scotland, which the moſt renowned of all his Predeceſſors could never do? in beating down, and extinguiſhing, that hereditary proſecution of Malice, called the deadly feud; a conqueſt, which ſhall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly Power, for evermore. And we have cauſe to hope, that his Royal care ſhall be no leſs happy in preventing the like miſchief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outragious vanity of Duelliſts.

Unto this that I have ſpoken of lying, and of man-ſlaughter, it muſt be added, That each of theſe are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproof and vengeance proportionably, more or leſs, in their ſeveral degrees. There is much difference between Lies of neceſſity, upon breach of promiſe, or complemental lies; and ſuch pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by falſe Witneſſes: the former ſort, being excuſable by weakneſs or levity; the latter, being altogether deteſtable. No leſs, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even Weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per inſidias; though our Laws do not much diſtinguiſh them in puniſhment. For in the latter, God, forſaking his own priviledg, commandeth, that the guileful Murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guileful murder performed by the Sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guileful murder alſo, by poyſoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For ſuch diſtinction is found, between coming preſumptuouſly upon a man, to ſlay him with guile, and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cauſe, upon hope of ſpoil, after ſuch manner as the net is ſpread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the firſt, Queen Mary of England, and the King's Majeſty now reigning, have given notable teſtimony of their Juſtice, upon three Noble men, who committed guileful murder. Of the firſt kind, King Francis upon the Lord of Talard: who being (ſaith the French Hiſtorian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & ſupporte de pluſieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and ſupported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in eſpecial favour with the King) was one, was notwithſtanding delivered over into the hands of the Hang-man. Queen Mary, upon a Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other reſpects very dear unto her. His Majeſty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whoſe houſe was no leſs ancient and faithful, than himſelf valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poyſon, and of puniſhment following ſuch wicked Artiſans, every Age hath had too many Examples. Of guileful killing by the pen (that I may not ſpeak of any Engliſh Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives us two notable inſtances: the one of des Eſhars, who (ſaith Paſquire) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maiſtre de France, pour contente l' opinion de celuy dont il eſtoit lors idolaſtre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & eſtrangle; Who cauſed Montaigu, great Maſter of France, to die, to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyn) whom at that time Eſhars worſhipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himſelf was ſoon after hanged and ſtrangled. The other was of the Great Francis the firſt, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to ſatisfie the King's paſſion, practiſed the deſtruction of the Admiral Chabot, a man moſt nobly deſcended, and of great ſervice. For as in other men, ſo in Kings, the paſſion of love grows old, and wears out by time. So the King's affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with ſome Offences which he had formerly committed. The Admiral, preſuming upon the great good ſervice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marſeilles againſt the Emperor, gave the King other language than became him; and deſired nothing ſo much as a publick trial. Hereupon the King (it being eaſie to provoke an ill diſpoſition) gave Commiſſion to the Chancellor, as Preſident, and other Judges, upon an information of the King's Advocate, to queſtion the Admiral's life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conſcience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with ſome of the Judges with ſo great cunning; with others, with ſo ſharp threats; and with the reſt, with ſo fair promiſes; as, albeit nothing could be proved againſt the Admiral, worthy of the Kings diſpleaſure; yet the Chancellor ſubſcribed, and got others to ſubſcribe, to the forfeiture of his Eſtate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to prevail againſt his Life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falſhood in ſo great a Magiſtrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (ſaith Paſquire) à tout Juge pour demourer touſiours enſoy, & ne laiſſer fluctuer ſa conſcience dedans les vagues d' vne imaginaire faveur, qui pour fin de ieu le ſubmerge; A fair leſſon to all Judges, to dwell always in themſelves, and not to ſuffer their conſciences to float upon the waves of imaginary favour, which in the end overwhelms them. And as for the Admiral: though it might have been anſwered unto his friends, if any bewailed his calamity, as undeſerved, that he was tried, according to his own deſire, by the Laws of his Countrey, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the King's Juſtice, ſurmounting all other his Paſſions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Eſtate.

†. III.

The laſt Acts of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is choſen Conſul.

THE laſt buſineſs that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the Rebellion of the People, and Mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerouſly ſick, in ſuch ſort, that the rumor of his Death ran currant throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a-while before, to take Arms againſt the Romans. They were vainly perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themſelves ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spain. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatneſs of their hopes, they thought it beſt, to take the preſent advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they raſhly fell upon the Sueſſetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans, and waſted their Countrey. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, inſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebels, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reaped ſuch profit of their Roman Conqueſts, as might ſatisfie their deſires; or as they thought eaſie to be gotten, if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the Death of Scipio was reported; they thought, that the time ſerved very well, to enrich themſelves with ſpoil of the Countrey. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greateſt of all, driving away their Colonels, that ſhould have bridled their fury; they choſe out of their own number, two baſe fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to be their Commanders. Theſe took upon them all the Enſigns of Proconſuls, or Proprætors; as if this their Election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was choſen by the Souldiers, after the Death of the two Scipio's. But whilſt they were deviſing, what Exploits they might do, for the enriching of themſelves, in a time of ſuch combuſtion, as was expected; there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonels, ſent unto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeeming to be glad, that they had no further over-ſhot themſelves, led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had reſolved to do exemplary Juſtice on the principal Offenders; and to put the whole Multitude of them in fear of what they had deſerved. Therefore he cauſed Syllanus, to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition againſt Mandonius, and Indibilis; He cauſed Albius and Atrius, with ſome thirty other of their Complices, to be ſecretly apprehended in their Lodgings; He called the Mutiners to aſſembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus, and his Companies, prepared for the purpoſe; he bitterly inveighed againſt them all, as Traitors. This done, Albius, and Atrius, with the other Priſoners, were haled to the ſtake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman Cuſtom toward ſuch offenders. The reſt of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thouſand, were cauſed to take their Oath of Obedience a-new; and received every man his pay when he was ſworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis, continued in Arms; notwithſtanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the ſeverity uſed to the Roman Souldiers; they ſtood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater Offenders, of harder meaſure. Scipio went againſt them; and found them in a Valley, that was ſcarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and ſending Lælius, with all his Horſe, to fetch a compaſs about the Hills, and charge them in Rear; he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining, to preſerve themſelves and their Eſtates, otherwiſe than by making ſubmiſſion. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himſelf, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his requeſt; yet ſo, that they were taught to acknowledg themſelves leſs free Princes than they formerly had been.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Maſaniſſa; who ſecretly promiſed to do him all ſervice, if the People of Rome would ſend him to make War in Africk. Unto Mago, that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spain alone, he ſhould thence depart with his Fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpoſe, was Money ſent unto him from Carthage: and he himſelf laid hold upon all that he could find in the Town of Gades; without ſparing either private men, the common Treaſury, or the Temples. In his Voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena: hoping to have taken it by ſurpriſe. But he failed in the attempt; and was ſo beaten to his Ships, that he returned back to repoſe himſelf a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the Robberies and Spoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not ſuffer him to enter again into their City. By this he foreſaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore ſending Meſſengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magiſtrates forth unto him; whom, notwithſtanding all the Excuſe that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended Voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The

The Isle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein: and himself with ten Ships returned home. At his coming to Rome he made suit for the honour of a Triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet been granted unto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as received that dignity after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voyce of the City P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custom of those times, go far from the City; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were staied by no such religious impediment, from being far, and long absent. Hereby it came to pass, that Scipio desiring to have the War transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so far off, §. XVIII.

Scipio obtaines leave to make War in Africk. His preparations. Of Masanissa who joyned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entring into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the Money which he had brought out of Spain into the Treasury; upon the setting forth of solemn Plays, that he had vowed to make, whilst he was busied in his Spanish Wars. This helped well to revive the Memory of his Victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the War, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassages avail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deservedly; saying, That they were the most happy of all their Countrymen, since they being present, had seen him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyful newes. The Saguntine Embassadours, were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Nevertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province: there wanted not many, even of the Principal Men, that vehemently gainsaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who seems to have been troubled with that disease; which too often causeth men renowned for long approved vertue, to look asquint upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kind. He alledged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chief were, That the Treasury was unable to sustain the charges of a War in Africk; and that it was extremly perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled, unto the defence of Rome it self, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his Brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from Enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spanish Wars, as of less moment than the intended voyage against Carthage; nor withal to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having suffered Asdrubal to pass into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, least the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithstanding the good success of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that year a Province: which the Consul nevertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted upon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive War: especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by help of Money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague, would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home: and taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he proposed the matter again unto the Senate. Much alteration there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who resented in this honorable man a little spice of that arrogancy, which, in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himself wholly unto the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicil might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to pass over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of Money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the War, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithal it fell out, that Mago, coming on the suddain from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no less terrible invasion upon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Army of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with civil Wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his party; and to help those whom he thought fittest for his turn, against the others. This troublesom business, though it occupied more of his time, than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unsteady Gaules ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardy, and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aid from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertain) loaden with the booty that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of Money, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into into Africk, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have been pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punik, and Greek letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesness; in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian, and the Roman Camp, is said to have been the occasion of this years idleness: which fell not out much amiss for the City of Rome, that was marvelously empoverished by this War; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no loss; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, unto the detectors of Lands concealed.

Of this, or other Money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make press of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he overmuch labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councels of Estate; that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, do carry all the rest. And many times, men make a surrender of their own judgments, to the wisdom that hath gotten it self a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himself upon the advice of many, shall often find himself deceived: the counsel of those many being wholly directed by the temper of a few, that over-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature sorted well with the business, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were grown old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needful resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the several Towns; Corn, Iron, Canvas for Sails, Axes, Beed-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Fir for building of Ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Spears of all kinds: every place furnishing him with that commodity, which it best could afford. Unto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of five and forty days, he had both fell his Timber, built, and launched, twenty Triremes, and ten Quinqueremes Gallies; wherewith he transported his Army into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himself well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergon a heavy censure. They had served under Marcellus, and Lævinus, at the taking of many Cities, and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africk; where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his Horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young Men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the War, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen; which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilst he was providing, to have things in a readiness for Africk; the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts Men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Town) being taken Prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison: which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing least their own paucity should make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Consul Scipio. The Townsmen, were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison, but much more against Pleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctity, was spoiled by these barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate, to make present amends to the Goddess for this Sacriledge: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint; comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principal the offenders, whom they cast into Prison, and used according to their deserts: as also they restored unto Proserpina her Money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithal contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully harkned to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to run on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp invective that Fabius made, others took courage to speak what they pleased: as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against the dissolutness of his Army; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindful of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legates were sent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Island; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examin these matters; and either cause the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his Journy; and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lælius in Africk; rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of War. He took a great booty: and struck ſtruck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who ſaw their affairs to be upon terms of change. But the greateſt fruit of his Journy was, That ſpeaking with Maſaniſſa, he well informed himſelf of the ſtate of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of thoſe two Kings, that had promiſed to joyn with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Maſaniſſa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made underhand with the Romans: Livy doth profeſs, That there was no ſuch evident cauſe thereof at the preſent; but that the long continuance of his faith and conſtancy, in following times, muſt help to prove, that this his change was not without ſome good cauſe. But Appianus (an Hiſtorian far inferiour to Livy, both in Worth and Time) gives one reaſon ſo propable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of neceſſary truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to paſs, that the knowledge of ſuch a matter ſhould have eſcaped the diligence of Livy, if it had been true: unleſs we ſhould believe, that he wilfully forbare to rehearſe a Tragedy; the ſorrow whereof would cauſe Men to think amiſs of Scipio. Howſoever it was, thus * Appian tells it: and many circumſtances of things done confirm it. Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, had a fair Daughter, whom both King Syphax and Maſaniſſa loved. Maſaniſſa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withal a goodly Gentleman of Perſon, and excellent in qualities, was choſen by Aſdrubal to be his Son in Law. When the Virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great ſervice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the Marriage of Aſdrubals Daughter to be a matter of State: and beſtowed her upon Syphax; without ſtanding to acquaint her Father or Maſaniſſa therewithal. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulſe, had made him become their Enemy. Hereof Maſaniſſa was advertiſed: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, ſecretly as he thought; yet not ſo ſecretly but that ſome notice was taken of it: which would have coſt him his life, had he not with great circumſpection conveighed himſelf home into his Fathers Kingdom. Thus far forth we may believe Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things paſt, and following. Only it ſeems, that howſoever Sophonisba the Daughter of Aſdrubal, was promiſed by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet ſince this their courteſie proceeded from fear, He thought it wiſdom to continue and increaſe the ſame their fear, by making fair promiſes to the Romans; until Aſdrubal had ſent for his Daughter from Carthage, and the Marriage was conſummated. In other matters concerning the War it ſelf, wherein Appian differs much from Livy, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livy did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Maſaniſſa was the Son of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whoſe Father dying, the Crown deſcended, by order of the Country, unto Deſalces the Brother, not unto Maſaniſſa the Son. But this Uncle of Maſaniſſa ſhortly died: and his elder Son, who took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, was vanquiſhed, and ſlain in Battel by a Rebel, that made himſelf Protector over the younger which was a Child. The Traitor fortified himſelf againſt Maſaniſſa, whoſe return he feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ſerve: He, and his Pupil, were diſpoſſeſſed of their Eſtates by Maſaniſſa; that was a skilful Warriour, and well beloved for the Memory of his Father Gala. The Carthaginians in reaſon ſhould have been glad, that Maſaniſſa, who had done them notable ſervice, was thus confirmed in his Eſtate: had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whilſt his Uncle or Couſen reigned, and he ſeemed unlikly to ſtand them in any ſtead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice towards his Corival, Warred upon him; and overcharging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdom. Nevertheleſs Maſaniſſa ſtill retained the hearts of his People: and thereby remained ſtrong enough, to infeſt both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in diſtreſs, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as to Hippo; and when Lælius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him, to haſten on Scipio to the invaſion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whoſe great aid and ſuccour was repoſed more hope of good ſucceſs, than could be expected from the good will of poor Maſaniſſa; ſent an Embaſſage into Sicil about the ſame time, which was little pleaſing unto Scipio. He excuſed himſelf of his promiſe lately made: and ſignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not choſe but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and Reigned; and for defence of his beloved Wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheleſs he promiſed to remain a Neuter; ſo long as the Romans and Carthaginians held War abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meſſage haſtned Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perſwaſion could have done. For the promiſed aſſiſtance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterpriſe; in procuring both the aſſent of the Senate, and the forwardneſs of many Adventurers. Leſt therefore the failing of this hope, ſhould work too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the beſt way, to prevent all diſcourſe, and ſet the War undertaken immediately on foot. The Embaſſadours he diſmiſſed in all haſte, with Letters to their King: wherein he willed him to conſider, that what he had promiſed he had alſo ſworn; and therefore ſhould do well to make it good. Having ſent them away, He called his Souldiers together, and bad them make ready for the voyage; which he intended no longer to defer. For, ſaid he, Maſaniſſa hath been with Lælius: and Syphax hath newly ſent to me; greatly wondering upon what I ſhould thus ſtay; and ſaying, that they will provide for themſelves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquiſition, that might elſe have been made concerning the meſſage of theſe Embaſſadours; whoſe followers had been ſeen walking up and down Syracuſe. And leſt any thing ſhould afterwards break out, that might hinder the buſineſs, Scipio immediately ſent about his Fleet unto Lilybæum: and requeſting by Letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; haſted thither with his Army. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the diviſion of the Legions between them; which to leave behind for defence of the Iſland; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he tranſported, it is not certain: ſome Hiſtorians reckoning only ten thouſand foot, and two and twenty hundred Horſe; others increaſing them to five and thirty thouſand, Horſe and Foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging longing to their course, I hold it needless to set them down: since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word, set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livy, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, near unto a Fore-land then called the fair Promontory; which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercury, and lay to the North-east of Carthage, or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa unto Scipio at his first arrival, helps to confirm the opinion of Xylander: who thinks the fair Promontory to have been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficulty Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment, soon after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Utica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed within the Promontory of Apollo; whence the way to Utica was not long. This is also strongly proved: for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred Horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roved about the Country with a Troop of Horse, to find out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lælius at Hippo: that was farther off: as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army and Carriages, to over-come the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compass to Utica by Land; when he might have disembarked nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gave charge to the Masters of his Ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Country thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified unto Lælius, when he spake with him at Hippo; thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to be such, as not only served to invade the Lands of Carthage, but threatned a Conquest of the City, and whole Estate; then might he better advise them to set Sail for Utica, and make War upon the Enemies at their own Doors.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the same that had lately been chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of War. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his Fellows, of whose Faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was at that present with the King his Son in Law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when Letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance; and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen General. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the Troop of Carthaginian Horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landing; and slain Hanno a young Gentlemen, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand Prisoners; all which he conveighed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them back loaden into Sicil. He took likewise a Town called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Numidian Horse: whose service being fitter for the Field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to perceive the unskilfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masanissa before him: who rode up to the Gates; and, by making a Bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno so far, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten; and Hanno either taken or slain. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Town; which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, * of which mention hath been formerly made; and sate down before it. Forty days he spent about it: assailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his Engines of Battery, whereof he had plenty; yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter Camp; which must be well stored against the year following. Whilst thus necessity urged him to leave Utica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better success, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Asdrubal had made a Levy of thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw near unto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse: which joyning unto the Forces of Asdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-camp the banks of an In-let, that had good harbour for his Navy. His Foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joyning to the Continent by an Arm of Land: his Horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottom of the Creek he mored his Ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole Camp he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the year, when it should serve him again to fight. Of Cattle and other Booty Masanissa had brought in great store; by driving the Country, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corn also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise Apparel for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turn; for that it was a matter of more cost. The Ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his Booty, as he could best spare; especially with Captives, to be sold for Slaves. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the severe institution, which the Romans used in discipline of War; or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

* Lib. 5. cap. 2. §. 3.

When Spring drew near; Scipio thought it good to aſſay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by perſwaſions to forſake the Carthaginians. It was conſidered, that thoſe Barbarians were naturally unconſtant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himſelf, by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peradventure no leſs weary with latiety of his wife, who had cauſed him to enter into this war: He might be moved with a little entreaty, to with-draw himſelf home into his Kingdom, and reſt a Neuter. But it is not unlikely, that ſuch a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleaſed him, or as he had been invited, to make a ſtep thither and repoſe himſelf a while: his wife Queen Sophonisba lying alſo there at the ſame time, to cheriſh him in his reſolution. Howſoever it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reaſonable, That Hannibal ſhould be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like ſort ſhould quietly depart out of Africk; and ſo make an end of the War, wherewith now both Africk and Europe were diſquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the firſt give ear: yet being preſſed earneſtly by many Meſſages from Syphax, and deſiring to continue the inter-courſe of Embaſſadors: He began to make ſhew, as if he would conſider of the motion. He was given to underſtand by thoſe whom he had ſent unto the King, That their Enemies had their Camps without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cabbins, and covered with Boughs: and that the Numidians, ſuch of them as came firſt with Syphax, uſed coverings of Mats and Reeds; others that came later, had thatched their Lodgings with dry Boughs and Leaves: under which they lay careleſly without their Trenches. Upon this advertiſement he berhought himſelf, That it would not be hard for him to ſet their Camps on fire; and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without help of ſome ſuch ſtratagem, he foreſaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his Wars when time ſhould ſerve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, eſpecially in Horſe; which upon ſuch ground, could not be reſiſted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter, the more needful he found it for himſelf, to make ſome ſudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he ſent many Embaſſadors, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpoſe to diſcover all that concerned the intended ſurpriſe. With theſe Embaſſadors he ſent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers diſguiſed like ſlaves; that wandring (as it were) idly up and down the Camp, might obſerve the ways and entrances, with whatſoever elſe was needful. When he had learned as much as he deſired: upon the ſudden he ſent word to Syphax, that it was vain to hold any longer Treaty, foraſmuch as he could not get the conſent of his Council of War; without whoſe approbation, all that himſelf could do was no more than the good Will of one man. This he did, to the end, that without any breach of Faith, he might put his deſign in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Aſdrubal and Syphax were very penſive; as having lately perſwaded themſelves, that their trouble was almoſt at an end. But ſince it could be no better: they began to deviſe, by what Art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp; and provoke him to Battel in thoſe Plains. This if they could do; they hoped to make his Council of War repent as greatly the refuſal of Peace, as did M. Atilius after the like preſumption. But if he ſhould refuſe to come forth of his Trenches: what elſe remained than to beſiege him? which they themſelves were well able to do by Land; and the Carthaginian Fleet ſhould do by Sea, that was making ready for the purpoſe. By ſuch diſcourſes theſe two comforted themſelves; recompencing in conceit the loſs of their hopes paſt, with that of Victory to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily diſappointed: for that, conſulting about the future, they provided not againſt preſent danger; but continued in the ſame negligence, which was grown upon them by the long diſcourſe of Peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle but made preparation out of hand; as it were to do ſomewhat againſt Utica. Two thouſand Souldiers he had made ready; and appointed to take the ſame piece of Ground, whereon he lay againſt Utica before. This he did, partly to keep ſecret that which he had in hand, leſt being ſuſpected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder thoſe of Utica from ſetting upon the few, that he purpoſed to leave behind him in his Camp. He cauſed his Men that night to ſup well and betimes; that they might be ready for the Journey. After ſupper, he appointed ſuch Companies as he thought fit, unto the defence of his Camp; all the reſt of his Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him ſeven miles and an half: whom he purpoſed to undertake himſelf with the one half of his Army: the other half he committed unto Lælius and Maſaniſſa, whom he ſent before him to ſet upon the Camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning that the Camp of Syphax ſhould be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might ſeem to have taken hold by caſualty upon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it firſt appeared in the Camp of Aſdrubal, it would be ſuſpected as the doing of Enemies; and give Syphax warning to look unto himſelf. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and ſoftly: that Lælius and Maſaniſſa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compaſs about for fear of being diſcovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the Camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himſelf, imputed unto caſualty; as thinking themſelves ſafe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interpoſed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to do, ſome, ſtarting half aſleep; and others, that had ſitten up late at drinking; ran out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But ſuch was the tumult, that they neither could rightly underſtand in what caſe they were; nor give remedy to the miſchance, as it was ſuppoſed. Many were ſmothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the ſudden miſchief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that eſcaped the fire fell upon the Enemies Sword, which was ready to receive them. Eſpecially Maſaniſſa, that beſt knew the Country, did great execution upon them; having laid all the ways, by which he foreſaw that they would ſeek to eſcape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pitiful miſchance: ſo that ſome ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would ſerve to quench the fire.

fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where fearleſs of any danger towards themſelves, they ſtood beholding the greatneſs of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore loſt no time: but ſetting upon thoſe that were running towards the Numidians, he killed ſome, and purſued the reſt back into their Camp; which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aſdrubal ſeeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not ſtand to make reſiſtance, but ſhifted only for himſelf, and eſcaped with a few of his horſe about him. If Hannibal; or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in ſuch a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been ſaid, that with leſs than one half of thirty thouſand men, he might at leaſt have given ſome bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling theſe fires, had he not been only careful how to ſave his own fearful head. Nevertheleſs Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is moſt likely to have been true, That if Aſdrubal or any of thoſe about him, would have ſtriven to ſhew valour, when the Camp was once on fire: He ſhould not thereby have done any manner of good; becauſe of the tumult and conſternation. I ſhall not need to tell what a fearful thing it was, to hear the cryes of ſo many thouſands that periſhed by fire and ſword, or to behold the cruel flame that conſumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to deſcribe. It is enough to ſay, That of thoſe many thouſands very few did eſcape; which accompanied Aſdrubal and Syphax in their ſeveral ways to flight. Beſides theſe alſo there were ſome ſcatterers, eſpecially of the Numidians, that ſaved themſelves in the dark: but they were not many; as after ſhall appear. Surely it muſt needs have been very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwiſe made away; and what numbers eſcaped in the dark of night. Wherefore Livy, who in the reſt of this Relation, as often elſewhere, doth follow Polybius; may ſeem to have followed ſome leſs worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in caſting up the ſum. For he reckons only two thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe, to have eſcaped; forty thouſand to have periſhed by ſword or fire; and above ſix thouſand to have been taken Priſoners: the whole number of all which together, is far ſhort of fourſcore and thirteen thouſand, which were in theſe two Camps.

Excerpt. è Pol. lib. 14.

Aſdrubal, putting himſelf into the next Town that was very ſtrongly fortified; thought there to find the Romans work; until the Carthaginians at good leiſure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe: which he thought ſufficient to defend the Town; if the Townſmen would not be wanting to themſelves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place, very earneſt in contention, whether it were better to fight or to yield. Unto this Diſputation, he well foreſaw that the arrival of Scipio would ſoon give an end. Wherefore, leſt they ſhould lay hold upon him, and ſeek the Victors favour by delivering him up; he ſhrunk away betimes and made all haſte to Carthage. As for the Town, which he left, it opened the Gates to Scipio, at his firſt coming: and thereby preſerved it ſelf from all manner of loſs. The two next Towns adjoyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of War: but their ſtrength not being anſwerable, they were ſoon taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleaſure of his Souldiers. This done, he returned to the ſiege of Utica.

The Carthaginians were ſore troubled, as they had good reaſon; when, in ſtead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard news of ſuch a lamentable overthrow. Neceſſity enforced them to make haſty proviſion for the future: but how to do it, few of them ſaw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy; but the moſt, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion; That notwithſtanding the loſs of this Army, they might well defend themſelves againſt the Romans, by raiſing new forces: eſpecially if Syphax, would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they ſhould bend all their care this way: levying in all haſte another Army; and ſending Embaſſadors to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not paſſing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the fame their unfortuuate Commander, Aſdrubal the Son of Giſco was imployed to make new levies of Men: and Queen Sophoniſba went forth with Embaſſadors to her Husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as he could, of his Subjects that had eſcaped from the late ſlaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdom. Sophoniſba laboured ſo with her Husband, that at length ſhe won him to her own deſire. And it fell out at the ſame time that four thouſand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians; were brought over to ſerve in Africk. Of theſe were made ſuch brave reports; as if their courage, and the Arms which they uſed, were not to be reſiſted. Even the multitude within Carthage believed theſe tales, and were more glad than they had cauſe to be; which is great wonder, ſince in one Age, the whole Country of Spain had been twice conquered, firſt by the Carthaginians themſelves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax theſe Tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaſſadors helped with a lye; ſaying that there were come ten thouſand of theſe terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence the people of Carthage and their friends, gathered ſuch ſpirit, that in thirty days they made up an Army conſiſting well near of thirty thouſand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great Fields, about five days journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this came from Utica thither, to viſit them: leaving behind him his impediments, with ſome part of his Army; to make a ſhew of continuing the Siege. Two or three days, after the meeting of both Armies, paſſed away in skirmiſh; without any great thing done. It had now been time for Aſdrubal to follow the Example of the Roman, Fabius; and ſeek to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a far worſe Commander, or elſe it was not in his power, to give ſuch directions as beſt pleaſed himſelf. The fourth day the Armies met in Battel: wherein the Romans were marſhalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; having their Italian Horſe in their right wing; and Maſaniſſa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary ſide, Aſdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax the left, and the Spaniards the Battel. The Victory was gotten without many blows: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Aſdrubal, could not ſuſtain the firſt charge of the Italians, or of Maſaniſſa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even till they were all in a manner ſlain: rather as men deſperate, and not hoping for mercy, ſince they were thus come over to fight againſt Scipio, who had otherwiſe deſerved of them; than upon any likelihood or conceit of Victory. This their obſtinacy was beneficial unto thoſe that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great purſuit. Hereby Aſdrubal and Syphax eſcaped: Aſdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his own Kingdom: whither his Wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the maſtry of the field, took counſel about the proſecution of the War. It was reſolved upon, as the beſt courſe, That he himſelf, with part of the Army, ſhould attempt the Cities round about him: and that Maſaniſſa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with ſome of the Roman Legions, ſhould follow after Syphax, not permitting him to take reſt within his own Kingdom, where eaſily elſe he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice it ſeems that Maſaniſſa gave: who knew beſt the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a Victory. The leaſt that could be expected, was his reſtitution into his own Kingdom, uſurped by Syphax: which to accompliſh, it no leſs concerned the Romans at the preſent, than it did himſelf. According to this order concluded, Lælius was ſent away with Maſaniſſa: and Scipio ſtayed behind; carrying the War from Town to Town. Many places yielded for fear: many were taken by force: and all the Subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of thoſe unreaſonable burdens, which their proud Maſters had laid upon them, for maintenance of the War in Spain and Italy. What to do in this caſe, the Carthaginians could hardly reſolve. Fortune was their Enemy: they had loſt their Armies, and many of their Towns: neither durſt they make bold to trouble their own Subjects with any violent exaction of Men or Money; who nevertheleſs of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them, to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy: yet ſince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, that Embaſſadors ſhould be forthwith ſent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to ſet out a Fleet againſt that of Scipio; that rode before Utica, weakly manned, and eaſie to be taken, whilſt Scipio himſelf was buſied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it ſhould be their principal care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: upon the ſafety whereof they ſaid, that all depended; adding, that whilſt they were true, and at unity among themſelves, they might well enough ſubſiſt, and expect thoſe opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtleſs) would preſent them. Theſe counſels were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman Feet at Utica. Nevertheleſs it was conſidered, that hereby they ſhould only protract the War: without any way advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of Victory; no, though it ſhould fall out, that all the Ships at Utica might be taken or deſtroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he ſhould immediately come over into Africk, as the laſt refuge of Carthage. The Council was no ſooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themſelves to the execution of that which was decreed: ſome to fortification of the Town: ſome to make ready the Fleet: and ſome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarke themſelves for Italy. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a City in thoſe days very ſtrong; and ſtanding in proſpect almoſt of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather ſome defenſible piece adjoyning, he eaſily took; the Garriſon forſaking it, and running away, as ſoon as he drew near. But whilſt he was about there to encamp, and fortifie himſelf againſt the City; he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet ſetting forth, and making towards Utica. What this meant, he readily conceived: and ſtood in great fear, leſt his own Ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily loaden with Engines of Battery, and wholly diſpoſed in ſuch order, as was moſt convenient for aſſaulting the Town) ſhould make bad reſiſtance, againſt a Fleet appointed for that ſpecial ſervice. Wherefore he haſted away towards Utica, to aſſiſt with his preſence in this needful caſe. It fell out well, that he had ſent his Carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he ſhould have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time; if the Carthaginians had uſed ſuch diligence as was convenient. But they reſted one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Utica, they tarried a while to make a bravado: preſenting themſelves in order of battel, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea againſt them. But Scipio had no ſuch intent: He thought it would be ſufficient, if he could preſerve his Gallies. As for the pleaſure of their bravery at Sea; it ſhould little avail the Carthaginians; if they got nothing by it, and loſt their whole Eſtate by Land. Wherefore he took his Ships of burden, and, faſtning them together with Cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a fourfold bridg over the Channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thouſand of his choice men, with ſtore of Darts, and other caſting Weapons, to make defence. Some open ſpaces he left; whereat his Frigots, and other ſmall Veſſels might run out, and back again, upon any advantage or need: but theſe he covered with planks; uſing the Maſts and Yards of his Ships inſtead of Rafters, to joyn all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridg it ſelf not be torn aſunder. Scarce was this work finiſhed, when the Carthaginians, ſeeing none iſſue forth againſt them, came into the Haven. The fight between them and the Romans, that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the aſſaulting of a Wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that ſtood upon the bridg, had ſure footing, and threw their Weapons downwards with their whole ſtrength and vilence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unſteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots and Long-boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridg, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occaſion of that ſmall loſs which followed. They that ſtood upon the bridg, were neither able to relieve them: nor yet could freely beſtow their Weapons among the Carthaginians, as before, for fear of hurting theſe their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the Enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hooks, hanging at Iron Chains. Theſe they threw upon the Maſts and Yards, which ſerved as Arches to joyn the bridg together: then rowing backwards, they tore all aſunder, in ſuch ſort, that one Ship followed another, and all the firſt rank was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to ſave themſelves as haſtily as they could, by ſhifting into the next rank of Ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themſelves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away ſix Ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their wellwellcom was greater than their victory: becauſe among ſo many grievous loſſes, only this Exploit had ſucceeded well; though it were of ſmall importance.

Whilſt things thus paſſed about Carthage, Lælius and Maſaniſſa, in their journey againſt Syphax, found as good ſucceſs as could be deſired. The fame of the victories already gotten, reſtored Maſaniſſa to his Kingdom, without further contention: the Maſæſyli, his Subjects, joyfully receiving him; and forſaking the Uſurper. But here they ſtayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had ſuch abundance of Men and Horſes, that he felt not greatly the loſſes paſt: and therefore being ſolicited by Aſdrubal and Sophoniſba, he prepared again for War. But beſide the inſtigation of his beloved Wife; the loſs of the Maſæſyli would let him take no reſt: neither was it the purpoſe of Lælius and Maſaniſſa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leſs unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to think all alike their own, whereof they are in poſſeſſion; be the title unto ſome part never ſo unjuſt. Hereunto alludes the Fable of the young Kite: which thought that ſhe had vomited up her own guts; when it was only the garbage of ſome other Fowl, that ſhe had haſtily ſwallowed, and was not able to digeſt. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, believed the Kingdom of the Maſæſyli to be part of his entrails: Lælius and Maſaniſſa will ſhortly give him ſomewhat, that ſhall make him caſt his gorge. For to this purpoſe chiefly are they come ſo far. It concerned the Romans to diſpoſſeſs (if it might be) that King: whoſe falſe and hollow friendſhip towards them, had been converted into ſtrong enmity; as alſo to ſet in his place another, who might do them ſuch good Offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How eaſily this might be effected, Maſaniſſa knew beſt: as being well acquainted with the nature of thoſe Countries; wherein, even to this day, though there be many ſtrong Towns, yet the fortune of a battel is enough, to tranſlate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax: who came againſt them with no leſs an Army than his former, and marſhalled in the Roman order; according to the skill which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago ſent unto him out of Spain, from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men, how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageouſly. They were a Rabble of all ſorts, gathered up in haſte: and few of them had ſeen the War before. Encamping near unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that ſome ſmall Troops of Horſe on both ſides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worſt, were ſeconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmiſh, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: ſo that at length Syphax, unwilling to diſhearten his men, by taking any foil at their firſt meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his Horſe, which were the beſt part of his Forces, and therewith over-charged Maſaniſſa, whoſe numbers were far leſs. But whilſt he was proſecuting his hope of victory: ſome Roman Squadrons of Foot came againſt him through their own Troops of Horſe; which fell to the ſides, and made a lane for them. So their Battel ſtanding now more firm than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and his Troops, grew confident upon this aſſiſtance: and charging afreſh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, cauſed him to give back. Herewithal the Legions came in ſight: which terrified ſo the Numidian Horſe, that they began preſently to diſband. Fain would Syphax have ſtayed them from flight; and to that end, made head in perſon againſt the Romans; with hope, that his men would be aſhamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was caſt from his Horſe, which received a wound; and ſo taken Priſoner. Of others that were ſlain or taken, the multitude was not great. It ſufficed, that they forſook the place, and fled: and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Maſaniſſa told Lælius, That this Victory ſhould make an end of the Numidian War, if preſently they haſted away to Cirta, the chief City of the Kingdom; whither he himſelf deſired to be ſent before with the Horſe, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lælius agreed. Maſaniſſa coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings miſchance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parley: wherein by many fair promiſes and threats, but eſpecially by ſhewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed ſo far, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one ſtrove to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the reſt, Queen Sophoniſba yeilded her ſelf into his hands; and vehemently beſought him, that ſhe might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her Youth, and excellent Beauty, ſo commended her ſuit, that Maſaniſſa forthwith granted it: and to make good his promiſe, married her himſelf that very day: thereby to prevent Lælius and Scipio from determining otherwiſe of her, ſince ſhe was his Wife. But Lælius, when he came thither, took the matter heinouſly; ſo that at firſt he would have haled her away, together with Syphax, and other Priſoners, and have ſent her unto Scipio. But being over-entreated by Maſaniſſa, he ſuffered the matter to reſt a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's diſcretion: to whom he ſent away Syphax, and other Captives immediately; following ſhortly after himſelf, with Maſaniſſa, when they had done what was needful in the Kingdom.

At the coming of Syphax there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the Field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Aſdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendſhip: with ſuch other commemoration of his paſt and preſent fortune; miniſtring to every one a large argument of diſcourſe. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forſake the Roman friendſhip, but to make War upon them unprovoked. He briefly anſwered, That his Wife had moved him ſo to do: calling her a Fury, and a peſtilent creature: and ſaying, That Maſaniſſa was no wiſer than himſelf; ſince he had now taken the ſame woman to his Wife, who would ſhortly draw him to the ſame courſes. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and ſtood in great doubt, leſt this perilous woman ſhould deprive him of Maſaniſſa, as ſhe had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Maſaniſſa and Lælius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable ſervice in this Expedition. Then taking Maſaniſſa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophoniſba: letting him underſtand, that the Romans had title to her head: and that ſhe was a miſchievous Enemy of theirs. Wherefore he entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great ſervices already done; (for which he ſhould be highly rewarded, to his own contentment) by committing a great Offence upon little reaſon. Maſaniſſa bluſht, and wept: and finally promiſed to be governed by Scipio; whom he nevertheleſs entreated, to think upon his Faith given to Sophonisba, that ſhe ſhould not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after ſome time ſpent in agony, he called unto him a ſervant of his, that had the cuſtody of his poyſon (which Princes then uſed to have in readineſs, againſt all miſchances that might make them unwilling to live): and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, ſent it unto her with this Meſſage; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his Wife: but ſince they who had power to hinder him of his deſire, would not yield thereto, he ſent her a cup, that ſhould preſerve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and eſtate, and accordingly to take order for her ſelf.

At the receit of this Meſſage and Preſent, ſhe only ſaid, That if her Husband had no better Token to ſend unto his new Wife, ſhe muſt accept of this; adding, That ſhe might have died more honourably, if ſhe had not wedded ſo lately before her Funeral. And herewithal ſhe boldly drank off the Poyſon. Thus Livy reports it. But Appian varies from this: and ſets it down agreeably to that which hath been ſpoken before, concerning the præ-contract between Maſaniſſa and Sophonisba. He ſaith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embaſſadors from Cirta met with Lælius and Maſaniſſa upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her own private, ſent Meſſengers to excuſe her Marriage with Syphax; as made againſt her will, by compulſion of thoſe in whoſe power ſhe was. Maſaniſſa readily admitted this excuſe; and accepted her to Wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perſwaſion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Maſaniſſa at his return; and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Maſaniſſa ſaid, ſhe was his own Wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he ſaid, it was no reaſon, that Maſaniſſa ſhould keep her in poſſeſſion, as long as it was diſputable, unto whom ſhe might appertain. Wherefore he willed him firſt of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her; wherein he ſhould have no wrong. Herewithal he ſent to fetch her away: and Maſaniſſa accompanied the Meſſengers, as it were to deliver her; but making her acquainted with the neceſſity, gave unto her a cup of poyſon, wherewith ſhe ended her life, before they came that ſhould have apprehended her. So he ſhewed unto the Romans her dead body; which he royally interred. The ſudden violence of Maſaniſſa his love, and the ready conſent of Sophonisba to marry with him; add not ſo much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cauſe (which [a] Livy notes) of the ſudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians; under whom he had been trained up, and done them great ſervice. Howſoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, ſent for Maſaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could; leſt his Melancholly ſhould lead him to ſome inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his raſhneſs, he brought him forth in preſence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and ſhewing how highly he had deſerved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gave unto him a Crown of Gold, with other Royal Ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the ſad remembrance of that which was paſt, unto the more chearful contemplation of good fortune, that began to ſmile upon him.

This was the firſt time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour, though Maſaniſſa well deſerved: yet would not the Title have redounded unto his great benefit; neither ſhould he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered poſſeſſion of his Countrey, together with the greateſt part of Syphax his Dominions. It ſeems not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in theſe Wars, and ſuſtained himſelf, with his Troop of Horſe, in ſuch ſort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheleſs have recovered his proper Inheritance, by the love of his own Subjects, without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquiſhed. As for the enlargement of his Kingdom, it was not more than he deſerved: neither were the Romans then in caſe, to make a Conqueſt of Numidia for themſelves; neither could they have wiſhed a fitter opportunity, than of ſuch a man, upon whom to beſtow it, that was their aſſured friend, and paſſable withal among the Numidians, as being (for the Maſæſyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the ſame Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noiſed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themſelves, in a politick ſort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their ſaluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great conſequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching upon his Neighbours on all ſides; but moſt of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little diſpleaſed. Hence it grew, that Vermina, the Son of Syphax (of whom we ſhall ſhortly ſpeak more) which held ſome piece of his Father's Kingdom, deſiring friendſhip of the Romans, and promiſing by all means to deſerve their love, requeſted therewithal, that they would call him King. But though it were ſo, that never any before him had made this a matter of ſuit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein; and anſwered very gravely, That it was not their cuſtom to give the honour of that appellation, ſave only unto ſuch Kings, as had greatly deſerved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in proceſs of time grew ſo proud of this their imaginary Prerogative, that they imputed as a ſingular benefit unto Kings, that no way depended upon them, the ſalutation by [b] that name; though it were not accompanied with any other favour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians deſire Truce: and break it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely diſmayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befal'n their good friend Syphax; and underſtood that Maſaniſſa, their mortal Enemy, had got poſſeſſion of his Kingdom. To increaſe their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes, in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his laſt being there. The Carthaginians had neither Forces, nor Cou-

Courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto him thirty Embassadors, Princes of the City, which were their Privy Council, to make suit for Peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the [e] feet of him, and of those that sate in Council with him.

[e] Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 14. Liv. lib. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio, and the rest, that, in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a Monument of their Clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his Company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for Peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power: for they would not have made such adoration unto the Romans, in their own necessity, unless they themselves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the City of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the War. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loss of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had Money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the Walls of Carthage; though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africk, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace; yet having the Conquest, as it were, in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace, which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making War, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these: That they should render up unto him all Prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and Fugitive Slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Island between Italy and Africk: That they should deliver up all their Ships of War, save Twenty; and that they should pay a great sum of Money, with certain hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three days: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdom, as if the War had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lælius unto Rome: where the fame of these Victories filled men with joy; and gave hope that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an Holy-day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their Gods. Lælius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happy success of the Romans in their African War, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his Subjects, and Prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him; who by rendring them to liberty, should do an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his Reign. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masanissa in Complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him; they called him King again; released his Numidians that were Captives; and sent him two Purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button; with such other Presents, as in time of their Poverty might serve to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Lælius gone from Rome, when the news came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire Peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without; until Lælius being sent for, came back from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The Errand of these Embassadors, was Peace: but the meaning of them, and of their City, was only to win time, and get respite from War, until Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain Peace for Carthage, by terror of their great Names and Armies, upon more easie Conditions. Wherefore they made an idle Discourse of the League that was concluded between them and Lutatius Catulus, at the end of the former War. This League, they said, all things well considered, did still remain in force: neither had there since been any War at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head besieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that, adventured in like sort, without Commission, to pass the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so: their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force, as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cause to wonder at this Tale; hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of a War, that had been so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lutatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledg and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gain time, until they might repair the War. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lælius; without any conclusion at all of Peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of Peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded; and gave him license thereupon, to proceed unto unto concluſion. This may with good reaſon be believed: ſince it was not unknown, that if the War continued, all theſe goodly hopes muſt reſt upon the moſt uncertain iſſue of one Battel between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune ſhould be averſe to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loſt.

Matters thus hanging in ſuſpenſe, before the Carthaginian Embaſſadours came back from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred Ships of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africk to Victual the Roman Camp, was overtaken by foul weather at Sea; and hardly eſcaping wrack, was diſperſed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of Victuals in Carthage: which cauſed the People to cry out upon their Magiſtrates, that they ſhould not let ſuch a booty eſcape them; ſaying, that the danger of Famine was greater and worſe, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were ſo that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to ther own greedy deſires: the multitude in Carthage underſtood (as it ſeems) that all this diſcourſe of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery: and therefore cared not for obſervation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewiſe in Alexandria, for all the Raſcality, together with Women and Boys, to be medling in uprores: the clamours of the Boys being in ſuch Tumults no leſs violent, than of the Men. Wherefore it is no marvel, if little regard were had of reaſon, or of honour, in any ſuch commotion. A Fleet was ſent out under Aſdrubal, to gather up the diſperſed Roman Ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the ſtation whereto their Camp adjoyned) and bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loſs, and for that the Town was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he foreſaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the War, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he ſent Embaſſadours unto them: both to require ſatisfaction for the injury done; and to deter them from entertaining any other hope, than in the Peace which they had ſo much deſired. Theſe gave the Carthaginians to underſtand, That Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, upon thoſe conditions which he had propounded. But (ſaid they) we hold it ſtrange, That ye, who ſo lately have caſt your ſelves to the ground before us, and kiſſed our Feet, after an unuſual manner of humility, confeſſing your ſelves to have perfidiouſly broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deſerved ſuch puniſhment as is due unto Rebels; ſhould ſo ſoon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the ſame crimes, for which ye acknowledged your ſelves worthy to be deſtroyed, having only recourſe unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repoſe in Hannibal that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amiſs, that ye ſhould conſider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner beſieged, and unable to ſtir: ſo that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greateſt need. Or let it be ſuppoſed, that he were now in Africk, and ready to give us Battel: yet ſhould it well agree with your wiſdom, to doubt what might befal; remembring that he is a Man, and not invincible. Now if it ſhould happen that he were overcome; what refuge have ye left unto your ſelves againſt hereafter? What gods will ye either ſwear by, to be believed, or call upon in your miſery? What words, and lamentable geſture will ye henceforth uſe, to move compaſſion? Surely ye have already waſted all your forces of perſwaſion, and ſhall not again deceive us, if ye refuſe the grace, whereof at the preſent ye are capable. It is no marvel though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themſelves upbraided with the baſe demeanour of their Embaſſadours. For it was not the general opinion of the City, that the Truce was broken by themſelves: though it had pleaſed Hanno, or ſuch as were of his Faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of ſubmiſſion; and to renounce not only their hope of the future, but all juſtification of matters paſt. And indeed it ſeems, that the Roman Embaſſadours were very much delighted, in the rehearſal of that point which was yielded unto them; as knowing that thereon depended the juſtice of the quarrel. But the Carthaginians took this in ſo ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence unto the Men, who had uſed unto them ſuch inſolent Speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in ſome ſort appeaſed; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the very reverence, due unto the place of thoſe that had uttered ſuch liberal words. So they were diſmiſſed in friendly ſort; though it were without anſwer to their Propoſition. There were alſo two Gallies appointed for their ſafe Convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their Perſons. Aſdrubal was then in the midway, as Men ſailed from Carthage towards Utica. He, whether only deſirous to pleaſe the Multitude, of whoſe diſpoſition he was informed; or whether directed by publick order, to cut off theſe Embaſſadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradas. Their Convoy, having brought them on the way, as far as to the mouth of Bagradas, wiſhed them a good Voyage; and ſo took leave of them, as if they had been then in ſafety; ſince the Roman Camp was even in ſight. The Embaſſadours took this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themſelves too much neglected, foraſmuch as their attendants did ſo abruptly leave them. But no ſooner had they doubled the Cape, than Aſdrubal fell upon them in ſuch manner, as they might well diſcern his purpoſe; which was, to have ſtemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gally of Aſdrubal; they ſlipt away, and made him overſhoot himſelf. Yet he gave them chace; and had well near ſurpriſed them. But they diſcovered ſome Roman Companies on the ſhore over againſt them, and therefore adventured to run their Veſſel aground: whereby they ſaved their own Lives; though a great part of their Company were ſlain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcuſable: and for the ſame cauſe perhaps were the Citizens heartned in ſuch a diſhonourable attempt, by thoſe that were deſirous to continue the War; that thereby they might be driven to ſtudy nothing elſe, than how to get the Victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the ſame fear, which had cauſed them to make ſuch earneſt ſuit for Peace, would alſo have cauſed them to be better adviſed, than thus to abandon all hope of Treaty: had they not been given to underſtand, that Hannibal was already Landed in Africk, in whom they repoſed no ſmall confidence; but verily perſwaded themſelves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themſelves contented with more eaſie conditions conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the Battel of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversly affected by Hannibals departure.

EVer since the loss of that Battel at Metaurus, Hannibal, remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded unto Claudius and Livius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Consul who followed Licinius; and Cn. Servilius Cæpio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitless. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Army, than to keep those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief Enemy was become, not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the Brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians; and found them so ready to stir in his behalf, that if he could have entred their Country strong, it might have proved no less needful for Scipio to return home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed unto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls, or Proconsuls, with an Army; among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was uncertain, upon which side Mago would break out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder, though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago; when things were in some readiness for his setting forwards, he met in the Country of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a Battel, wherein though his vertue shewed it self worthy of his Father and Brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtful; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: and strained themselves hard; as if at that brunt the Victory should have been carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the Service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, scent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to mannage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the Troops that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of Darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom he had in readiness for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill: They were soon beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his Men began to shrink, He put himself in the head of his Army; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a greivous wound in his Thigh; whereof shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by some of his own Men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand Enemies, with the loss of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, besides those that died of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark, that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any Prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant Sons of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago withdrawing himself (by easie journies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it self was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Army; but died of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to return into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadours were delivering their Errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet plain dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long ago done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply, that should have enabled me to mannage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruin of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readiness, doubting that, which after came to pass: wherein he embarqued, besides his own Men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that ſhrunk back from him, and refuſed to do ſervice in this Expedition: of whom ſuch as he could take he ſlew; not ſparing thoſe that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly tranſported with rage; and departed out of Italy no leſs paſſionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countries to go into exile. He looked back unto the ſhore: accuſing both Gods and Men; and curſing his own dulneſs, in that he had not led his Army from Cannæ, hot and bloodied as it was, directly unto the Walls of Rome. With ſuch vexation of ſpirit He quitted the poſſeſſion of Italy; wherein he had lived almoſt half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the firſt beginning of this War, with what exceeding joy in times following they ſhould entertain the news of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I think) leſs earneſtly have preſſed the Carthaginians to ſend him over thither. When ſure advertiſement was brought unto the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holiday was appointed for thankſgiving unto their Gods; and extraordinary great ſacrifices publikly made, for joy of ſuch happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did ſtill remain the ſame, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his coming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to perform abroad in a land of ſtrangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped, was enough to make them preſume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embaſſadors brought unto them a great maſs of Gold and Silver, together with ſome Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian Priſoners were accepted; the treaſure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had ſurpriſed it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of thoſe Monies, that had been borrowed in time of more neceſſity from private Men. Hence alſo proceeded the ſevere chaſtiſement, laid upon thoſe twelve Colonies, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refuſed to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to ſet out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horſe anſwerable to the very moſt of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet ſuitable to the greatneſs of their ſpirit) upon the good ſucceſs of the Battel at Metaurus; and the hopes which they repoſed in Scipio. All this notwithſtanding, when they conſidered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few days ſince diſcharged, was landed ſafe in Africk: they began to revolve a thouſand fearful matters in their heads, and to ſtand in doubt, leſt Q. Fabius (who died about the ſame time) would be found a true Prophet. For bethinking themſelves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories againſt Syphax and Aſdrubal no ſpecialty of ſuch great worth, as might promiſe the like ſucceſs againſt another manner of General, followed by other manner of Men, than were either of thoſe two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a raſcal mutitude of half Scullions, that were good for nothing; being himſelf a ſit Captain for ſuch Souldiers. Likewiſe Aſdrubal, the Son of Giſco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwiſe one, that in the field was only good at ſaving himſelf by a ſwift retreat. But now there came an Army, of Men hardned from their Childhood with incredible patience, fleſhed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the ſpoils not only of good Souldiers, but of brave Captains, by them ſlain. Such talk uſed the People of Rome, ſaying, That Scipio was like to meet in Battel, with many that had ſlain Roman Prætors, yea and Conſuls, with their own hands, with many, that had been firſt in getting over the Trenches of ſeveral Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of walls at the Seige of Towns; breifly, that he ſhould now be oppoſed by an Army, as good as had ever ſerved in War, and following the dreadful Name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treates with him about Peace in vain; loſeth a Battel at Nadagara, and perſwades the Carthaginians to ſue for Peace. Of the Peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal diſembarqued his Army at Leptis, almoſt an hundred miles from Carthage, Eaſtward from the Headland of Mercury, and ſomewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horſe; which it was not eaſie for him to tranſport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, ſomewhat far from the Enemy; that he might furniſh himſelf with this and the like needful helps, againſt the day of Battel. From Leptis he paſſed on to Adrumetum, and ſo along through the Inland Country; gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was ſaid to have in thoſe days the beſt Horſes of ſervice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party: making him underſtand, that if the Romans got the victory, it ſhould be eaſie for Maſaniſſa, by their countenance and help to oppreſs both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his proſpect. This Argument, and the fame of him that uſed it, prevailed with Tychæus; who ſhortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thouſand Horſe. Appian further addes, That Mezetullus, (the ſame who had made himſelf Protector over Maſaniſſa his Couſens; and was Head of a Family, and adverſe to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought unto Hannibal another thouſand Horſe: as likewiſe that Vermina the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the ſame time to aſſail the places that yielded obedience to Maſaniſſa. This Vermina, as we find in Livy, came with more than ſixteen thouſand men (for he loſt more than ſo many) to ſuccour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in ſuch hard eſtate, or (at leaſt) ſo impatient of the ſtate wherein they were; that they could not attend the leiſure of thoſe preparations, which would have made the victory aſſured. When they conſidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatneſs of his Acts: it offended them to think, that they had been ſo baſe, as to make humble ſuit unto the Romans for Peace; whilſt they had ſuch a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cauſe by War.

But

But when they bethought themſelves of their own ſufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earneſtly, that it was no time to linger, but preſently to fight; that ſo they might ſee an end of theſe troubles, either good or bad. And to this purpoſe, they ſent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to do what he could do out of hand. Hannibal made anſwer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to diſpoſe of him and his Army: but ſince he was General of their forces, He thought it reaſonable, that they ſhould ſuffer him to do as a General ought to do; and to chooſe his own times. Nevertheleſs, to give them ſatisfaction, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to his Embaſſadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to underſtand the reſolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield unto any conditions unprofitable for themſelves, as long as they were able to make reſiſtance. Wherefore he ſent unto Maſaniſſa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with ſpeed, and lay all other buſineſs a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horſe and Foot together, Maſaniſſa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him ſervice in the eſtabliſhing and enlarging of his Kingdom. But he well underſtood, that thoſe and many more beſides all his own forces would little avail him; if Hannibal ſhould drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking ſuch order as he could upon the ſudden, for the ſafety of his own Kingdom; with four thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot, he made all haſte unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of theſe new troubles, the Carthaginian Embaſſadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lælius and Fulvius: who brought them ſafe into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived, and underſtood what had lately paſſed, eſpecially how their Citizens had behaved themſelves towards the Roman Embaſſadors: they made little doubt, how their own heads ſhould anſwer for ſuch notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion, M. Bæbius, one of the late Embaſſadors that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them, and detained them; ſending word unto his General, who was gone abroad to make War in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coyn, for the injury by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; and commanded Bæbius to uſe them with all poſſible courteſie, and ſend them ſafe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and cauſed them to acknowledge themſelves, (which was a great victory) far leſs honourable than the Romans. This notwithſtanding, He made more cruel War upon them than before: taking their Towns by force; and putting them to ſack, without hearkning to any Compoſition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by aſſault, to put all that came in their way to the Sword, whatſoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themſelves terrible: and the better to work ſuch impreſſion in the minds of thoſe, with whom they had to do, they uſed oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beaſts, that ran athwart them in the ſtreets; hewing their bodies aſunder, as Men delighted in ſhedding of blood. This being their practice at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revengeful minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were ſo earneſt in preſſing Hannibal to fight.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 16.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, ſent forth his Scouts and Spies, to diſcover where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of theſe were taken, and brought unto Scipio: who inſtead of truſſing them up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleaſure; appointing one to conduct them up and down, and ſhew them whatſoever they deſired. This done, He gave them liberty to depart; and ſent them away ſafe unto their General. Hannibal underſtanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the ſudden he grew deſirous to have an Enter-view, and perſonal conference; and ſignified ſo much unto him, by a Meſſenger ſent of purpoſe. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned anſwer, that he would meet him ſhortly in place convenient. The next day Maſaniſſa came with his Army: whom Scipio taking with him removed unto a Town called Nadagara; near unto which he ſat down, in a place otherwiſe commodious, and cloſe by a Water that might opportunely ſerve his Camp. Thence he ſent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly ſerve, if He had ought to ſay to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within four miles of the Enemy: where he encamped well to his own good liking in all things elſe; excepting that his Men were driven to take much pains, in fetching their Water ſomewhat far off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a Troop of Horſe, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a peice of ground, which was before well ſearched, for fear of ambuſh. There they will their followers to ſtand off: and themſelves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while ſilent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, ſaluting the Roman, to deliver his mind to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the ſhores of Africk and of Italy; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spain, about which their Fathers and themſelves had ſtriven, were no ſufficient recompence of ſo many Fleets as had been loſt, and of ſo much blood as had been ſhed, in making thoſe coſtly purchaſes. But ſince things paſt could not be recalled: He ſaid, That it was meet for them to conſider, unto what extreme dangers their own Cities had been expoſed, by the greedy deſire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length, to make an end of their obſtinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wiſdom hereafter. And to ſuch peaceable diſpoſition He affirmed that his own years, and long triall of Fortune both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fix his mind upon uncertain hopes, than upon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are ſubject. Yet (ſaid He) mine own example may peradventure ſuffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that ſame Hannibal, who after my victory at Cannæ wan the greateſt part of Italy: and deviſed with my ſelf, what I ſhould do with your City of Rome; which I hoped verily to have taken.

Once I brought mine Army to your Walls, as thou haſt ſince brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, ſee the change! I ſtand here entreating thee to grant us Peace. This may ſerve as a document of Fortunes inſtability. I fought with thy Father Scipio: He was the firſt of the Roman Generals, that ever met me in the Field. I did then little think; that the time would come, that I ſhould have ſuch buſineſs, as now at the preſent, with his Son. But this is even one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof ſhe hath many. And thou maiſt have experience of the like in thy ſelf, who knows how ſoon? Think upon M. Atilius. If he would have hearkned unto ſuch perſwaſions, as I now uſe to thee; he might have returned home to Rome an happy man. And ſo mayſt thou do now, if any reaſonable offer will give thee ſatisfaction. How ſayſt thou? Canſt thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatſoever Iſlands elſe are ſcituate between Italy and Africk, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left unto the Romans, to bear Dominion therein? Thou ſhalt have Glory enough by effecting thus much, and the Romans may well be glad of ſuch a bargain. As for us: our own quiet ſhall henceforth give us contentment. And the ſame contentment of ours, ſhall make us faithfully obſerve the Peace with you. But if thou thinkeſt all too little; I muſt deſire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou muſt undergo, for the obtaining of a very little more, than that which thou maiſt have without contention. It is now in thine own power, to lay hold upon good Fortune, if it pleaſe thee: ſtay but till to morrow night, and thou muſt take ſuch Fortune, as it ſhall pleaſe the Gods. The iſſue of Battel is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steel we ſhall each of us bring into the Field: but of the Victory, neither of us hath aſſurance. Let us therefore without more a do make Peace: And do not tell me, that ſome falſe-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treaty: It is I Hannibal that now deſire Peace with thee; which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient I will always maintain it: like as I have maintained unto my Power, as long as the Gods did not envy me, the War by me begun. Hereunto Scipio made anſwer, That it was no ambitious deſire of ruling in Sicil and in Spain, which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their Confederates, had cauſed them to put on thoſe Arms; which the Gods by the final iſſue of the Wars had approved, and would approve to be moſt juſt. As for the murability of Fortune: he ſaid, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of inſolence, or over-weening, he might well refuſe the conditions offered. For was it not plain, that all theſe Countries, with which the Carthaginians now ſo willingly departed were already won from them by the the Romans? If ſaid he, theſe Conditions had been propounded whilſt as yet ye detained ſome part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the Caſe now ſtands, I ſee no reaſon why I ſhould remit unto you any one piece of thoſe my former demands; to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to deal graciouſly in being ſo moderate. Rather I ſay, that the injuries which they have done me ſince, have made them unworthy of obtaining Peace upon ſo friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldſt be glad to make thy Citizens underſtand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eaſed. Only thou muſt think, that in like ſort it concerns me in Honour, not to let them be gainers or ſavers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knoweſt well, that, beſides thoſe offers which thou here haſt made, they were well contented to reſtore unto us ranſom-free all Priſoners that they have of ours; to pay us five thouſand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and to deliver Hoſtages for aſſurance of fair dealing. And muſt they now be diſcharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their ſpoiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embaſſadours? Not ſo: But if they can be contented, beſides all this, to make ſuch amends as I ſhall require, for theſe injuries newly done: then will I take advice with my Council what anſwer to give you; otherwiſe, you may even prepare for War, and blame your own ſelves, for that I have denied you Peace.

Hereupon they brake off; and returned each to his own Camp, with no other news than War; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a Battel, wherein ſhould be decided the quarrel between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they iſſued into the Field: a notable Match, and ſuch as hath very ſeldom been found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the Battel at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing firſt the Haſtati, divided in to their Maniples, or ſmall Batallions, with a reaſonable diſtance between them: Not far behind theſe followed the Principes, likewiſe divided; and ſo after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary cuſtom of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes oppoſite unto the void ſpaces between the Haſtati, that ſo the Haſtati, as was uſual, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were in File. This he did becauſe of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had many. For of thoſe Beaſts the danger was leſs, whilſt there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took ſuch order, that when they had paſſed through the ſpaces between the firſt Batallions, they ſhould not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites or thoſe of the light armature, that were to begin the Fight, He gave direction, that when they found themſelves overcharged, either by the Enemies, (or which was moſt to be feared) by the Elephants, they ſhould run back through thoſe Lanes that were between the Maniples and that thoſe which were ſwifteſt, or otherwiſe beſt able, ſhould continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army; thereby leaving room enough unto thoſe that were wounded, or caſt behind, to ſave themſelves on the void ground, that was betwixt the firſt and ſecond, or the ſecond and third Battels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples which he deſired to keep open. His Italian Horſe he placed in the left wing under C. Lælius. In the right wing was Maſaniſſa with his Numidians. He himſelf riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly; uſing words not many, but very forcible. He bad them remember what they had atchieved, ſince their coming into Africk. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the War was at an end: and that their Victory in this War, ſhould make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to reſiſt them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own ſtanding Camp: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them ſhelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory; unleſs they would live like wretched ſlaves under moſt mercileſs Enemies. In ſuch neceſſity, he ſaid, that they which conſider themſelves to be, and take reſolution anſwerable thereunto, have never been known to fail of getting Victory.

Hannibal on the other ſide placed his Elephants, that were more than fourſcore, in Front of his Battel. Next behind theſe, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares, and Moors. Then followed his Battel; which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more intereſſed in the quarrel than were thoſe Mercinaries; though not ſo good Souldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thouſand Macedonians, lately ſent from King Philip. More than the ſpace of a Furlong behind theſe came his Rereward conſiſting of thoſe brave Souldiers which had ſerved him in his Italian Wars; and were the only Men, in whom he repoſed any confidence. Oppoſite to Lælius, in his own right Wing he beſtowed the Carthaginian Horſe. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left Wing againſt Maſaniſſa. He was indeed far to weak for the Enemy in Horſe, both in number and in goodneſs. For Tychæus and Mezetullus had no more than three thouſand; and thoſe not ſo well exerciſed, as were the four thouſand of Maſaniſſa. The Carthaginians alſo were no more, nor none other than ſuch as could be levied in the haſte of a few days; and the remainder of thoſe that had of late been often vanquiſhed, and accuſtomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make theſe his Companions alight and ſerve on foot, ſetting better men in their Saddles. All that he could have done, was to ſtay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vermina the Son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few days after, with ſixteen thouſand and upwards, the moſt of them Horſe: the advantage of number might have ſerved well to ſupply all other defect. Yet ſince the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay: Hannibal muſt be fain to comfort himſelf, with the hope that he repoſed in his old Italian Souldiers; whoſe vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more ſtrongly oppoſed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their ſeveral conditions: promiſing unto the Mercinaries bountiful rewards threatning the Carthaginians with inevitable ſervitude, if they loſt that day; but eſpecially animating his old fellow-ſouldiers, by the many Victories which they had obtained againſt far greater numbers. He bade them look upon the Enemies; and make an eſtimate, whether they were any thing like ſo many, as that huge Army which they had ſlaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the Father of this Man, whom they had firſt of all compelled to run away. He told them that theſe Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the moſt part of them the very worſt of the Roman Souldiers; even ſuch, as for their daſtardly flight out of ſundry Battels could no longer be truſted to bear Arms in their own Country. As for the reſt, they were young men, the Sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of thoſe weapons, by which their Fathers were daily ſlain or chaced. Wherefore he entreated theſe his old companions, upon whoſe vertue he meant wholly to repoſe himſelf, that they would this day ſtrive to make good their honour; and to purchaſe the fame of Men invincible.

Such exhortations uſed the two Generals before the Fight. When they drew near together: the Numidian Horſemen on both ſides began to skirmiſh. The Trumpets, and other Inſtruments of War, ſounded to Battel: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of theſe Elephants (as they were always an uncertain kind of help) thoſe that ſtood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear, and ran upon their own Numidian Horſe; which they affrighted and diſordered. Maſaniſſa eſpying this, gave charge upon the ſame Numidians; and not ſuffering them to re-ally themſelves, drave them quite out of the Field. The reſt of thoſe beaſts made a great ſpoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the ſpaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battallions themſelves; which gave them open way, according as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious could no longer be governed: but ran back upon the right point of their own Battel, and beyond that into the open Field. Herewithal they diſordered the Carthaginian Horſe which were in that wing: againſt whom they gave to Lælius the ſame advantage, that Maſaniſſa had againſt the Numidians; which he uſed in like ſort. In the mean while the Battels of Foot advanced, and drew near together with a ſlow and ſtately pace, till they were almoſt within a Weapons caſt: at what time they gave a ſhout and ran one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time ſeemed both in audacity, and in quickneſs to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harm, than they took. But the Roman diſcipline after a while, prevailed againſt the boiſterous violence of theſe untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the Battel of the Principes, following ſomewhat near after the Haſtati, encouraged their Fellows; and ſhewed themſelves ready, if need were to relieve them. Contrariwiſe, the Mercinaries received no manner of help or comfort, from thoſe that ſhould have ſeconded them. For the new levied Carthaginians and Africans, when they ſaw their hired Souldiers give back, did alſo themſelves retire. This cauſed the Ligurians, Gaules, and the reſt, to think themſelves betrayed: whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battel was herewith more terrified than before, ſo as it refuſed to give way unto the Mercinaries for their ſafe retreat: and yet withal forbore to make head againſt the Enemies, that purſued them. It was no time to ask them what they meant by this; Fear and Indignation cauſed thoſe that were at once chaced by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own Fellows, to turn their Arms with an heedleſs fury againſt both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and ſlain, through their own indiſcretion, by their own Mercinaries. The Roman Haſtati in like ſort, fighting with deſperate men in a throng, had their hands ſo full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to over-bear this great medley of Enemies, that were together by the ears among themſelves. In this place was made a great ſlaughter, both of the Mercinaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor eaſily fly. Such of them as eſcaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not ſtir one foot, to help or ſave theſe Run-aways. He cauſed his men to bend their Pikes at thoſe of his own ſide, that would have ruſhed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aſide beyond his Battel, and ſave themſelves in the open Field. The ground, over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with ſuch thick heaps of dead bodies and weapons, and ſo

ſlippery with blood: that Scipio began to ſtand in great doubt, leſt the orders of his Battalions ſhould be diſſolved in paſſing that way. In ſuch caſe, if he ſhould fight with that warlike Army, which he ſaw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well aſſured to receive a notable overthrow. He cauſed therefore the Haſtati to make a ſtand there where they were, oppoſite unto the main battel of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarij; he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Haſtati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the days work, till now, ſeemed to have been only a matter of paſtime; in regard of the ſharp Conflict, that was maintained between theſe notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged, by their having prevailed all the day before: They were alſo far the more in number. But theſe old Souldiers of Hannibal were freſh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with ſuch obſtinate reſolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather choſe to die upon the ground, whereon he ſtood. So that after a long time, it was uncertain which part had the worſe: unleſs it may ſeem, that the Romans were beginning to ſhrink; foraſmuch as the return of Maſaniſſa and Lælius, from purſuit of the Ene-Excerpt. è Polyb. l. 15. mies Horſe, is ſaid to have been moſt happy, and in a needful time. Theſe upon the ſudden charged the Hannibalians in Rear; and over-bearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to rout.

In this Battel there died of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian ſide, above twenty thouſand, beſides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater, Captain of the Macedonians, was one. The ſingular skill that Hannibal ſhewed in this his laſt fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Livy reports, by Scipio himſelf. But the Enemies were too ſtrong for him in Horſe: and being enjoyned, and as he was by the ſtate of Carthage, to take battel with ſuch diſadvantage, he could work no marvels. He ſaved himſelf with a few Horſe; and ſtaid not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he ſent for to Carthage; from which he had been abſent ſix and thirty years. At his coming into the Senate, he ſaid plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take ſuch peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other courſe to take, reſolve to ſend Embaſſadors again; and try the favour of Scipio, whoſe arms they could not now reſiſt.

Scipio having ſpoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Utica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies, and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, he thought it beſt to make towards Carthage: rather of purpoſe to terrifie the City, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius; whom he willed to meet him there by Land. Then ſending Lælius away to Rome, with news of the Victory, he ſet ſail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by Ten Embaſſadors from the City: who bearing up with the Admiral Gally, began to uſe the pitiful geſture of Suppliants. But they received none other anſwer, than that they ſhould meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City: and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it; he returned back to Utica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom, in perſon, he ſet forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the news, that Vermina, the Son of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more Horſe than Foot, to the ſuccour of thoſe that were already vanquiſhed. This Vermina ſeems to have been both careleſs of getting intelligence, how things paſſed, and very defective in all other duties requiſite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horſe, was ſent againſt him: which did not only beat him, but ſo compaſs him in, that he hardly eſcaped himſelf with a few; leaving fifteen thouſand of his followers dead behind him, and twelve hundred taken Priſoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they ſhould have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loſt, by default of Horſe. But God had otherwiſe determined. It is not to be doubted, that this Victory, though it were no great acceſs unto the former; yet ſerved well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embaſſadors from Carthage: whoſe behaviour, though it was more pitiful than it had been before; yet procured it leſs commiſeration, by reaſon of their late falſe dealing, after they had in like ſort humbled themſelves. Nevertheleſs it was conſidered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to beſiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly Scipio ſtood in great doubt, leſt the honour of this War, if it were protracted, ſhould be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Conſuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Conſul who had charge of the War againſt Hannibal, at ſuch time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to paſs over into the Iſle of Sicil (as it were in chaſe of Hannibal, by him terrified and driven away) with a purpoſe thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Army there. But a Dictator was choſen of purpoſe, to reſtrain the ambition of this Conſul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made ſuit for the ſame Province of Africk: and was therein ſo earneſt, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his deſire; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Conſul, might joyn with Scipio, were it with no more than equal authority. But ere he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readineſs for the journey, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and he was only toſt at Sea with foul weather, firſt upon the Coaſt of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Conſulſhip expired, and ſo he returned home a private man. Then came the joyful news to Rome, of the Victory obtained againſt Hannibal, and that the War was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus, the new Conſul, ſo paſſionate, in deſiring Africk for his Province, that he ſaid he would ſuffer nothing to paſs in the Senate, until he had firſt his will. Much ado there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at laſt it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it ſhould be granted by Scipio; if the War continued, Scipio ſhould have command therein by Land, and the Conſul at Sea. The ambition of theſe men, cauſed Scipio to give the more favourable anſwer unto the Carthaginian Embaſſadors. He willed them to conſider what they had deſerved: and in regard thereof, to think themſelves well dealt withal, in that he was contented to leave unto them their Liberty, and their own Laws, without out appointing any Governor over them, or Garriſon, to hold them in ſubjection; leaving alſo unto them their poſſeſſions in Africk, ſuch as they were at the beginning of this War. As touching the reſt, he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or Truce, they ſhould make ſatisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilſt the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto, if they would yield, then required he, That immediately they ſhould deliver up unto the Romans all Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, that they had of theirs: likewiſe all their Gallies, excepting Ten: and all their Elephants: That they ſhould make no War at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yet within Africk, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Towns, Goods whatſoever, belonging any wiſe unto Maſaniſſa, or to any of his Anceſtors, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored unto him: That they ſhould find Corn for the Roman Army, and Wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, until the Peace were fully concluded: That they ſhould pay ten thouſand Talents of Silver, in the term of fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year; and that for obſervance of Conditions, they ſhould give an hundred Hoſtages, ſuch as Scipio would chuſe, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With theſe Conditions the Embaſſadors returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very unpleaſing; and therefore one Giſco ſtood up to ſpeak againſt them, and exhorted the People, who gave good attention, that they ſhould not condeſcend unto ſuch intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withal what favourable audience was given to this vain Orator, by the unquiet, yet unwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him down from his ſtanding, by plain force. Hereat all the people murmured; as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by ſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, roſe up, and ſpake unto them: ſaying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwiſe than the Cuſtoms of the City would allow; foraſmuch as he had been thence abſent ever ſince he was a Boy of nine years old, until he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excuſed himſelf of the diſorder, he diſcourſed unto them concerning the Peace; and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themſelves; had the demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice, they reſolved to yield unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand five and twenty thouſand pound weight of Silver, in recompence of Damages, and Injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embaſſadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three months; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithal he gave injunction, that they ſhould neither in the mean while ſend Embaſſadors any whither elſe, nor yet diſmiſs any Embaſſadors to them ſent; without firſt making him acquainted what they were, and what their Errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wiſe and honourable men, by the miſeries whereinto Carthage was fallen, through their malicious Counſels. Aſdrubal, ſurnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embaſſages which they ſent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embaſſadors; who related unto the Senate, and People, theſe joyful news. About the ſame time arrived at Rome Embaſſadors from Philip, King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for audience, till the Election of new Conſuls, then in hand, was finiſhed; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embaſſadors called into the Senate: who firſt anſwering unto ſome Points, wherein the Romans had lately ſignified unto their King, that they found themſelves grieved; returned the blame upon thoſe Greeks themſelves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accuſed they M. Aurelius: who being one of the three Embaſſadors, that had lately been ſent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellows; and there levying Men, made War upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they deſired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreymen, that had lately ſerved Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Priſoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio; might be releaſed, and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had ſent to Rome for that purpoſe, made a ſharp anſwer. He ſaid, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured ſo many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to ſtay behind, to help them as he might; which elſe were like to be brought under the King's ſubjection. As for Sopater: he affirmed him to be one of the King's Council, and very inward with him, one that ſerved not for Money, but carried Money with him, and four thouſand Men, ſent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About theſe Points when the Macedonian Embaſſadors could make unto the Senate no good anſwer; they were willed to return, and tell their Maſter, That War he ſought, and War he ſhould find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points he had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: firſt, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and ſecondly, in that he had aided their Enemies againſt them with Men and Money.

Theſe quarrels with Philip, that promiſed to open a way into Greece, and the Eaſtern Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embaſſadors in their ſollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Aſdrubal, above the reſt, was much reſpected, as one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romans from neceſſity of ſending Embaſſadors to Carthage, upon the like Errand. He liberally granted, that the juſtice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Roman ſide, ſaying, that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the City, that had been too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſel. But if Hanno and himſelf, might have had their wills; the Carthaginians, even at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould have granted the Peace which they now deſired. Herewithal he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no ſmall argument of their valour, by which always they had been victorious. To the ſame effect ſpake the reſt of the Embaſſadors: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diverſity of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproof of Perjury, as they themſelves might have laid upon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had been ſuch as the Romans was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what Gods they would ſwear to keep the Peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwer, Even by the ſame Gods, Gods, that are ſo ſevere unto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus, the Conſul, interpoſing the authority of his Office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto concluſion of Peace; for that hereby he was like to loſe the honour, which he purpoſed to get by making War in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom reſted the Soveraign Command of Rome: and by them referred wholly unto pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates ſent unto him from Rome, of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, upon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had already propounded. For this favour, the Carthaginian Embaſſadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might viſit their Countreymen, which were Priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſom, and carry home with them ſome, that were their eſpecial friends; of whom they gave in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadors, would chuſe, ſhould be ſent over into Africk, and be freely reſtored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the Ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in Commiſſion.

At their coming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controverſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's, than upon the Fugitives; and upon thoſe of the Romans, than upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the firſt payment of their Money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſury could have ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent: yet ſince the Penſion was annual, and to continue fifty years; it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collecting of the ſum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman Yoke had begun to pinch them; ſo as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwiſe Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Aſdrubal Hædus, and told, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had been the cauſe why all others did weep; He anſwered, That laughter did not always proceed from joy; but ſometime from extremity of indignation. Yet, ſaid he, My laughter is more ſeaſonable, and leſs abſurd, than your tears. For ye ſhould have wept, when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the uſe of Arms; without the good leave of the Romans firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keeps us under; and holds us in aſſured ſervitude. But of theſe matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little Money is wrung out of your private purſes, ye have thereof ſome ſenſe. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye ſhall acknowledg, That it was the very leaſt part of your miſery, for which ye have ſhed theſe tears. Thus diſcourſed Hannibal unto thoſe, who taſting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counſel, repented when it was too late; and inſtead of curſing their own diſorders, which had bred this grievous Diſeaſe, accuſed that Phyſician, whoſe noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the Remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Maſaniſſa, and magnified him in preſence of the Army, with high commendations, not undeſervedly. To him alſo he conſigned over thoſe Towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that preſent held: wherein, to ſay truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwiſe he knew not well how to beſtow. But the love of the Romans, and friendſhip of Scipio, was fully anſwerable, now and hereafter, to all the deſervings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there reſted no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themſelves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio, with ſome part of his Army, took his way home to Rome by land; and ſent the reſt before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no leſs glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he paſſed along. He entered the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with ſo great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time ſhortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and died ſoon after in Priſon: or whether he were dead a-while before, it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, That it was a barbarous Cuſtom of the Romans, to inſult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumelioufly in Triumph; yea, though they were ſuch, as had always made fair and courteous War. But hereof we ſhall have better Example, ere the ſame Age paſs. It was neither the perſon of Syphax, nor any other glory of the Spectacle, that ſo much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous War paſt, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope, that ever they ſhould ſet Italy free. This made them look chearfully upon the Author of ſo great a converſion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio, the Title of the African: ſtiling him by the name of that Province which he had ſubdued. This honourable kind of Surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was uſurped by men of leſs deſert: eſpecially by many of the Cæſars, who ſometimes arrogated unto themſelves the Title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if ſuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

Plut. in vita Sertorij.

OF the great similitude found in worldly Events, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are less to wonder, if we find less variety: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious unto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended Conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks, with such numbers of men, as might have seemed resistless. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine War devised upon that Conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor, with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus, with his well-trained Army, had made the attempt upon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, have been far different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them, to imploy the travel and vertue of their Men, rather than the greatness of their names, against those people; that were no less valiant, though less renowned, than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdoms, when they decay in strength, suffer, as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolf, gored by the Bull, yea, and kickt by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misunderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the Vertue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foil'd by any of less noted Excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerodach, had stumbled; Pyrrhus, the Epirot, had dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entred into War against the Romans. This War he undertook, as it were, for his minds sake: having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended Conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own vertue to be of richer mettal, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: then did all the bravery of the Epirot (his Elephants, and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. * For since they had overcome the best Warrier in Greece, even him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compass of twelve years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their own devotion, by some good means, the whole Countrey of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punick War was ended, which followed soon after the Wars of Pyrrhus, and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after news in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilful Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Teuta made at the same time cruel War upon the Greeks: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrel, if the Romans were desirous to enter, the Queen was not slow to give them [c] cause. And their happy accomplishing of that War which they made with

* The King of Spain's pretended invincible Navy, being beaten out of the British Seas, invited us to those of Spain: and having broken the greatest Fleet that ever the Spaniards gathered together, we never made account of any of his preparations after that time.

Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian War. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards increased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them being now the Subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his Reign, and his first Actions.

It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of four years, new Kings began to Reign in the most of all Countries known; and three of them young Boys, in three of the greatest Kingdoms. This happened from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his Brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolemy Philopator succeeded in the Kingdom of Ægypt unto his Father Evergetes. And Philip the Son of Demetrius, being sixteen or seventeen years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and most of the Greeks; by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariaratbes then began his Reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King over the Lacedæmonians, whose Common-weal, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headless; and Achæus, a Kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the state of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open War brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemy, and the rest, we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his Reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achæans, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it self by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleomenes: was now become no less obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have been to the Spartan; and therewithal it lay open unto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Ætolians were no Men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than War. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messenians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no less unexpected, then it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoil of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achæans were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Ætolians, passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Aratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most ungratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achæans. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay a few days until the time of his own Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achæans for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himself a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of an Army. He suffered them to pass quietly along with their booty, through a great part of the Country, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so near, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Achæans; they got hereby only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by Licence of King Philip, they made confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians invaded Peloponnesus again; having no more to do, than to pass over the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulf of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There joyned with them in this their second Invasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no Ships of War unto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seek adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompained the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havock in the Country now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because Men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment laid upon the Lacedæmonians; who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Ætolians, in meer despight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had been so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended Rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgment: but entreated the King, that he would abstain from coming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant always to remain at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did misunderstand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achæans, Bœotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complayning upon the Ætolians: and desiring to have War decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his Letters unto the Ætolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose:

purpoſe: whither if it pleaſed him to come or ſend, he ſhould be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Ætolians underſtood this for certainty, they adjourned the Council unto a further time: ſaying, That ſuch weighty matters ought not to be handled, ſave in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithſtanding, open War was proclaimed againſt them. And they, as it were to ſhew how well they had deſerved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of theſe invaſions made on Peloponneſus; and the only Man, in a ſort, upon whom they muſt have laied the blame of theſe actions, if they would have ſhifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared buſily for the War againſt the year following. He alſo aſſayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with fair words and promiſes: whom he eaſily won from the Ætolian ſide, foraſmuch as the Ætolians had couſened him of his ſhare, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like ſort the Achæans, who had firſt of all others proclaimed the War in their own Country, ſent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Meſſenians, and Lacedæmonians: requeſting them forthwith to declare themſelves, and to denounce War unto the Ætolians; without ſtaying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers anſwers, according to the qualities of thoſe with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a ſmall Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they ſtood in continual danger; ſaid, that they could not honeſtly refuſe to ſhew their faithful meaning in that War, which was concluded by general aſſent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheleſs more cunning and reſerved: ſo that they ſtood upon a needleſs point; and deſired to be held excuſed, until Philip (of whoſe meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) ſhould firſt proclaim the War. The Meſſenians, for whoſe cauſe the War was undertaken, excuſed themſelves, by reaſon of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders; and ſaid, that they durſt not be over-bold, until that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians; the chief of them ſtudied only how to mannage that Treaſon, for which their City had been ſo lately pardoned: and therefore diſmiſſed the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, without any anſwer at all. They had three years together continued ſubject againſt their wills to the Macedonians, expecting ſtill when Cleomenes ſhould return out of Ægypt to Reign over them again; and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they choſe not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of theſe there were ſome, that thought the publick ſafery to conſiſt, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preſerved them: And hereto they referred all their Councils; being perhaps not a little moved with reſpect of the benefit, which might redound unto themſelves, by adhering firmly to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule over them. Others, and thoſe the greater part, were ſtill deviſing, how to make all ready for Cleomenes againſt his return; and therefore ſought to joyn with the Ætolians, which were the moſt likely to give him ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durſt more freely ſpeak their minds: but the contrary ſide was the more paſſionate; and ſpared not by murders, or any other violent courſes, to ſet forward their deſire. Neither did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended: fancying unto themſelves the glory of their Anceſtors in ſuch Ages paſt, as were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able Man to reſtore them unto their greatneſs and luſtre; which once he had in a manner performed: But ſince he was dead, and that, without injury to his well deſerving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helps, they muſt continue little better than ſubjects unto the Macedonian, and far leſs by him reſpected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they tranſported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working ſpirits among them, procured the Ætolians to ſend an Embaſſy to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durſt have made himſelf the Author. Much diſputation and hot there was, between thoſe of the Macedonian party and theſe their oppoſites: in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded; until by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chief, that ſpeak againſt the Ætolians, the diverſity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans; who had ſpared the City, when they might have deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardful of their ancient Laws, as touching the chooſing of the one King; that we may juſtly wonder, how they grew ſo careleſs in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royal Families they found Ageſipolis the Son of Ageſipolis the Son of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to Reign over them, as Heir apparent to his Grandfather. This Ageſipolis was a young Boy, ſtanding in need of a Guardian, and had an Uncle, his Fathers Brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the Son, how young ſoever, ſhould have his Fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though ſtanding in need of a Man, were ſo punctual in obſervation of the Law; that they made this Child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royal Family, though there was no want of Heirs: yet would not the people trouble themſelves about any of them, to examine the goodneſs of his Claim; but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, beſtowed upon each of the Ephori a Talent, and thereby made himſelf be ſaluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partiſans, and to approve his worth by Action, invaded the Country of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of Peace. There he did great ſpoil, and wan divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmon. After ſuch open hoſtility, the Lacedæmonians declared themſelves on the Ætolian ſide; and proclaimed War againſt the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the War fell out much otherwiſe, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they firſt made preparation, Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain anſwer: the Meſſenians would not ſtir: all the burden muſt lie upon themſelves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleaſure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could aſſail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing over the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Town of Ægira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grievously have molested the Achæans; for that it stood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sicyon two of their principal Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Country. But as Ægira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost again, through greedines of spoil; whilst they that should have made it their first care to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the Cittadel and other pieces of strength, fell heedlesly to ransack private Houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter back unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territory of the Dymæans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacy. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten that the Enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society. In vain. For the Achæans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercinaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his War, they had covetously with-held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Achæans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driven to withhold their contribution heretofore made for the publick service, and to convert the Money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achæans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots joyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the Seige of a Frontier piece; which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty days, ere he could end the busines; which tended only to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming; it was thought that he might have made an end of the War. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not seldom, that the importunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their main designes. Thus was our King Henry the eighth led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the Siege of Tournay: at such time as the French King Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that of his Cavalry, wherein rested his chief confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earl of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himself into Britain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to overrun Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, He took, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrymen at his return; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Peloponnesus, but even to Macedon it self. But this their pride was soon abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his work at Ambracus, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He took Phoetiæ, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pæanium, Elæus, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes; and wasted all the Country over, without receiving any harm. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to do the like spoil in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently sollicited by the Achæan Embassadours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a Journy into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Country; as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismiss the Achæan Embassadours, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So He took his way home: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaced out of his Kingdom by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Doson, in the Wars of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captains. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army; and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Ætolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they required with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was the ruin of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of War until another year was laid aside: Philip stole a Journy into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about four hundred Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth, He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arrival. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achæan Souldiers ready to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Country, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to fear: since the Achæans themselves themſelves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; until they heard, that theſe two thouſand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellowes, were by him ſurpriſed, and all made Priſoners, or ſlain. By this exploit which he did at his firſt comming, Philip got very much reputation: as likewiſe he purchaſed both reputation and love, by divers actions immediatly following. He wan Pſophis, an exceeding ſtrong Town, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He wan it by aſſault at his firſt coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake ſuch a piece of work at ſuch an unſeaſonable time of the year, was careleſs of providing even ſuch ſtore of Weapons, as might have ſerved to defend it. The Town was preſerved by the King from ſack; and given to the Achæans of his own meer motion, before they requeſted it. Thence went he to Laſion, which yielded for very fear; hearing how eaſily he had taken Pſophis. This Town alſo he gave to the Achæans. The like liberality he uſed towards others; that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to Husbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even ſuch as were of the wealthier ſort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done ſacrifice to Jupiter, feaſted his Captains, and refreſhed his Army three days; He proceeded on to the ſpoil of thoſe that had taken pleaſure to ſhare with the Ætolians, in the ſpoils of their otherwiſe deſerving Neighbours. Great abundance of Cattel he took, with great numbers of Slaves, and much wealth of all ſorts; ſuch as could be found in rich Villages. Then fell he in hand with the Towns whereinto a great multitude of the Country People were fled. Some of theſe were taken at the firſt aſſault. Some yielded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his Journey, by ſending Embaſſadours to yield before he came. And ſome that were held with Garriſons againſt their wills, took courage to ſet themſelves at liberty, by ſeeing the King ſo near; to whoſe Patronage thenceforth they betook themſelves. And many places were ſpoiled by the Ætolian Captains; becauſe they diſtruſted their ability to hold them. So the King wan more Towns in the Country, than the ſharpneſs of Winter would ſuffer him to ſtay there days. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made ſuch haſte from him, that he could not overtake them, until they had covered themſelves within the Town of Samicum; where they thought to have been ſafe. But Philip aſſaulted them therein ſo forcibly, that he made them glad to yield the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their Lives and Arms. Having performed ſo much in this Expedition, the King repoſed himſelf a while in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he ſpent all the reſt of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Peloponneſus, the Lacedæmonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten ſomewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to do great matters. But when they were admoniſhed, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themſelves home. This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdom of Sparta, than that which he could buy with Money: ſo was he neither free from danger of conſpiracies made againſt him; nor from thoſe jealouſies, with which Uſurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royal blood, that thinking himſelf to have beſt right unto the Kingdom, purpoſed to make way thereunto, by maſſacre of his oppoſites: and afterwards to confirm himſelf, by propounding unto the Multitude ſuch reformation of the State as was moſt popular: namely, by making an equal diſtribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient inſtitution of that Common-wealth. He wan to his party ſome two hundred Men; with whom he fell upon the Ephori as they were together at Supper, and ſlew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his Houſe: who perceiving the danger, ſtole away and fled. It remained that he ſhould give account of theſe doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto prediſpoſed; they ſo little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilſt he was uſing his beſt perſwaſions, they were conſulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and ſhifted preſently away. So he lived afterwards among the Achæans a baniſhed Man, and hated of his own People. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: and ſuſpecting thenceforth all thoſe of Herculis his race, found means to drive out his Fellow-King young Ageſipolis; whereby he made himſelf Lord alone. His doings grew to be ſuſpected, in ſuch ſort as once he ſhould have been apprehended by the Ephori: But though his actions hitherto might have been defended; yet rather than to adventure himſelf into judgment, he choſe to flie for a time, and ſojourn among his friends the Ætolians. His well known vehemency in oppoſition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him ſuch good liking among the People, that in his abſence they began to conſider the weakneſs of their own ſurmiſes againſt him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Eſtate. But in time following, He took better heed unto himſelf: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was ſo acknowledged) but by taking order, that it ſhould not be in the power of the Citizens to expel him when they liſted. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chaced Ageſipolis out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That his being the firſt of three Uſurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the laſt of the three very juſtly deſerved. Whatſoever he was towards ſome private Citizens: in the War againſt Philip, He behaved himſelf as a provident Man, and careful of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Philip was miſadviſed by ill Counſellors: Who afterwards wrought Treaſon againſt him, and were juſtly puniſhed. He invadeth the Ætolians a ſecond time: And forceth them to ſue for Peace: which is granted unto them.

WHilſt the King lay at Argos, deviſing upon his buſineſs for the year following; ſome ambitious Men that were about him, ſtudied ſo diligently their own greatneſs, as they were like to have ſpoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Doſon had left unto Philip ſuch Counſellors, as to him did ſeem the fitteſt Men for governing of his youth.

The

The chief of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man seeming to himself a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable piece of service to his Prince; if he could reduce the Achæans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to pass; during the late expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achæans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the Booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastize some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whip them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their fellows; them he laid by the heels, and punished as Mutiniers. Hereby he thought to bring it to pass by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habit of blind obedience; and think nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matter of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the War against Cleomenes: They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus; and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King as in a matter more weighty, then at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begun. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought so well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable service, in business of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the Head; since, in biting at the Tail, the Fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be, than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out: and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especial friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Achæans, and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves, unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needful in a business of more importance; the King, by fair words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Favourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans; which was called Tichos. The Garrison yielded it up for fear, at his first coming: whereof he was glad; for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it upon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no Messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Country the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyn with him upon reasonable terms. This if they could be contented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all Prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all foreign invasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Laws, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon their Country; then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-hasty to believe such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutual diffidence between them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him Prisoner into Ætolia: But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marvelling what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus; Apelles, his Counsellor, thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his Son together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: and long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati (the Father and the Son) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudicial to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian; and this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye; devised by Apelles himself, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearse it over again to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such ungrateful wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; that whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his own or a man of worth; He should forbear a while to give credit, until he had diligently examined the business. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himself Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few days: wherein whilst Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetful, to examine him about the conconſpiracy of the Arati: which when he found no better than a meer device againſt his honourable friends; he entertained them in loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby ſomewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remiſſion therein could be diſcerned.

The unreſtful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to paſs; began (as commonly Ambition uſeth) to ſwell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himſelf to his cunning again: and as before being checkt in his doings with thoſe of the vulgar, he had prepared a ſnare for the Arati; ſo failing of them he thinks it wiſdom to lay for the King himſelf, and for all at once which were about him. In ſuch manner ſometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which drave away Flies out of the Chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Air by the Bird that was too ſtrong to be caught and held by the ſubtil workmanſhip of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithful men and ſuch as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captain of the Targuetiers, and Megaleas chief of the Secretaries, were eaſily won to be at Apelles his diſpoſition. This Politician therefore ſtudied how to remove the other two from their places, and put ſome Creatures of his own into their rooms. Againſt Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumniation and privy detraction. But for the ſupplanting of Taurion he uſed more ſtreneſs; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of War, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill ſpare from being always in his preſence. By ſuch art he thought to have removed him as we ſay, Out of Gods Bleſſing into a warm Sun. In the mean ſeaſon Aratus retired himſelf; and ſought to avoid the dangerous friendſhip of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately choſen by ſuch vehement inſtance of the King; He was a man of no diſpatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deal of time was loſt, whilſt Philip wanted both the Money and the Corn, wherewith he ſhould have been furniſhed by the Achæans. This made the King underſtand his own error; which he wiſely ſought to reform betimes. He perſwaded the Achæans to rejourn their Parliament from Ægium, to Sicyon the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his Son: perſwading them to forget what was paſt; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travel of theſe worthy men, he eaſily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand, with great ſtore of Corn: and further decreed, That ſo long as he himſelf in perſon followed the Wars in Peloponneſus, he ſhould receive ten Talents a Month. Being thus enabled he began to provide ſhipping, that ſo he might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime People, at his pleaſure, and hinder their excurſions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond meaſure, to ſee things go forward ſo well without his help; even by the miniſtery of thoſe whom he moſt hated. Wherefore he entred into conſpiracy with Leontius and Megaleas: binding himſelf and them by oath, to croſs and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King ſhould take in hand. By ſo doing they thought to bring it to paſs, that very want of ability to do any thing without them, ſhould make him ſpeak them fair; and be glad to ſubmit himſelf to their directions. The King it is like had ſtood in ſome awe of them whilſt he was a Child: and therefore theſe wiſe men perſwaded themſelves, that, by looking big upon him, and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own miſgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a Child ſtill. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the proviſions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two ſtaid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindful of their wicked oath, than of their duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readineſs: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his Forces againſt the Eleans; to whoſe aid therefore the Ætolians ſent men, little fearing that the miſchief would have fallen, as ſoon after it did, upon themſelves. But againſt the Eleans and thoſe that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achæans, with ſome part of his and their Mercinaries. He himſelf with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Iſle of Cephallenia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling over againſt it, uſed to furniſh themſelves of ſhipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he beſieged the Town of Palæa, that had been very ſerviceable to the Enemy againſt him and his Confederates; and might be very uſeful to him, if he could get it. Whilſt he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen Ships of War from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Meſſenians. But the Town was obſtinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts ſave one, on which ſide Philip carried a Mine to the Wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targetiers, was appointed by the King to make the aſſault. But he, remembring his Covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his beſt; and cauſed others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foyl, and many ſlain; not of the worſt Souldiers, but ſuch as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treaſon of their Captain, and ſome by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this: but there was no remedy; and therefore he thought upon breaking up the ſiege. For it was eaſier unto the Townſ-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilſt he ſtood thus perplexed, and uncertain what courſe to take: the Meſſenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them deſirous to draw him into their own Country. The Meſſenians alledged, that Lycurgus was buſie in waſting their Country: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Eteſian Winds which then blew, ſerving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto alſo Leontius perſwaded; who conſidered that thoſe Winds, as they would eaſily carry him thither, ſo would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-days) and make him ſpend the Summer to ſmall purpoſe. But Aratus gave better counſel, and prevailed. He ſhewed how unfitting it were, to let the Ætolians over-run all Theſſaly again, and ſome part of Macedon, whilſt the King withdrew his Army far off to ſeek ſmall adventures. Rather he ſaid, that the time now ſerved well to carry the War into Ætolia; ſince the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their ſtrength. As for Lycurgus; he was not ſtrong enough to do much harm in Peloponneſus: and it might ſuffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head againſt him. Accord-cording to this advice, the King ſets ſail for Ætolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Ætolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to ſee him on their borders; and joyned with him as many of them as could bear arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the in-land Country; and taking ſome places by the way, which he filled with Garriſons to aſſure his Retreat; he paſſed on to Thermum; which was the Receptacle of the Ætolians, and ſureſt place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Faſtneſs, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow, ſteep, and difficult aſcent. There did the Ætolians uſe to hold all their chief meetings, their Fairs, their Election of Magiſtrates, and their ſolemn Games. There alſo they uſed to beſtow the moſt precious of their goods, as in a place of greateſt ſecurity. This opinion of the natural ſtrength, had made them careleſs in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing elſe to do than to take ſpoil: whereof he found ſuch plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Army: and conſuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Ætolians, in remembrance of the like their courteſie, ſhewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (queſtionleſs) more for the Kings Honour have been forborn. But perhaps he thought, as Monſieur du Gourges the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would do he believed before; and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thouſand of them there were that lying in ambuſh fell upon his skirts: but he had laid a Counter-ambuſh for them of his Illyrians; who ſtaying behind the reſt, did ſet upon the backs of the Ætolians, whilſt they were buſily charging in Rere the Army that went before. So with ſlaughter of the Enemy, he returned the ſame way that he came: and burning down thoſe places that he had taken before, as alſo waſting the Countrey round about him, He ſafely carried all that he had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of fight, iſſuing out of Stratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faſter than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious Expedition being every way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any ſiniſter accident; it pleaſed the King to make a great Feaſt unto all his Friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the reſt Leontius, with his Fellow Megaleas. They came, becauſe they could not chuſe: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleaſure they took in the Kings proſperity. It grieved them to think, that they ſhould be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindring the Kings buſineſs; ſince Apelles himſelf, as will be ſhewed anon, had played his own part with a moſt miſchievous dexterity. The ſorrow and indignation, which they could ill diſſemble in their faces, brake out after ſupper, when they had warmed themſelves with drink, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent they fell to reviling him, throwing ſtones at him, ſo that they cauſed a great uprore; many running in (as happens in ſuch caſes) to take part with the one or the other. The King ſending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had paſſed. Which made him ſend for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their diſorder; and they, to give him froward anſwers: inſomuch as they ſaid at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a miſchief as he deſerved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea, and to caſt him into Priſon? Why, ſaid the King, It was even I. This reſolute anſwer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both ſad and angry; ſeeing himſelf out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his anſwer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings Victory at Palæa, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leſs touching Leontius, that ſtood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accuſed. In concluſion, the preſumptions againſt him were ſo ſtrong, and his anſwers thereto ſo weak: that he, and Crimon one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crimon being remanded back to priſon; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megaleas. This was done upon the way homeward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip diſpatched well a great deal of buſineſs this year. For as ſoon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an expedition againſt the Lacedæmonians. Theſe and the Elæans had done what harm they could in Peloponneſus, whilſt the King was abſent. The Achæans had oppoſed them as well they could; with ill ſucceſs: yet ſo, as they hinderd them from doing ſuch harm as elſe they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Country about Lacedæmon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well believe that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this expedition any Cities, but made great waſte in the Fields: and having beaten the Enemy in ſome skirmiſhes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of Cattel, Slaves, and other Country-ſpoyl. At Corinth he found attending him, Embaſſadors from the Rhodians and Chians: that requeſted him to ſet Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deal firſt with the Ætolians; who, if they would make the ſame requeſt, ſhould not find him unreaſonable. The Ætolians had ſped ill that year: neither ſaw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had ſent forth to waſte Theſſaly and Macedon, found ſuch oppoſition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean ſeaſon they had been grievouſly afflicted, as before is ſhewed, by Philip in the center of their own Country. All Greece and Macedon was up in Arms againſt them, and their weak Allies the Elæans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of theſe their Peloponneſian friends ſhould be able to hold out; ſince they were not ſtrong enough to keep the Field, but had already ſuffered thoſe miſeries of War, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to ſeek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirty days with the King, dealt with him by interceſſion of the ſame Embaſſadors, to entreat his preſence at a Diet of their Nation, that ſhould be held at Rhium; whether if he would vouchſafe to come, they promiſed that he ſhould find them conformable to any good reaſon.

Whilſt

Whilst these things were in hand; Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sorted to no good effect. The Souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the King's friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it self in a noise, and breaking open of doors; without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea, the Souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew, as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were sore afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it self, to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their Treason; requesting him speedily to repair to Corinth, where he might stand between them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the business, undertaken by him and his treacherous Companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves unto him; and received from him their dispatch in every business. Likewise the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles; making slight mention (only for fashion sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancy of this great man, in setting himself out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his especial care, that Money, and all things needful for the publick service, should be wanting. Yea, he enforced the King, for very need, to sell his own Plate, and houshold vessels: thinking to resolve these, and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubœa, to the City of Corinth, where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great Pomp and Royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspition of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time; for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his Attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him, save his own Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacy, he used him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look unto himself, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion, his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of service; but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a Messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalf. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the Debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they said, that they were ready to make a Purse for his discharge. This affection of the Soulkliers, made Philip more hasty than else he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere Letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætolians; villifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King understood more perfectly the falshood, not only of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him so poor. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megaleas, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his Son, and another that was inward with him, to Prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lives. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to trial, nor knowing whither to fly, was weary of his own life, and slew himself about the same time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this War upon hope of accomplishing what they lifted in the Non-age of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince, tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Nevertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by the Kings Targettiers; they began to hope a-new, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope throughly to tame this unquiet Nation; He thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning, and continuing the War, should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the year following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter in their own Countrey. In his return homeward, he called into judgment one Ptolomy, a Companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians, and suffered Death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his Imprisonment: yet now they think the man worthy to die, that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip wan some bordering Towns; from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make Roads into his Kingdom. When he had thus provided for safety of his own; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Ægypt, and from the City of Byzantium, re-continuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This fashion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to set the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of War, but presently there were found Intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly Offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to bind unto them those people, that were, howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good Souldiers. But hereby it came to pass, that the more froward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient to redeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of peace, done what harm they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and standing in fear to be more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the War as soon as they might. Philip made such answer to the Embassadors as he had done the former year; That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: but that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withal, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himself would return such answer as he should think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by Letters out of Macedon, what a notable Victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battel at Thrasymene. These Letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal; and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus, an Ætolian, make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves: without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Country should be at peace within it self: and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly serving, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy. Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatning them at hand: but being soon after weary of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so far from observing and following their own good counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece; whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for Damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenor of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THis being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip, to prepare for the business of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battel of Cannæ: after which he joyned in League with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsel, to take part with their Enemies. It had otherwise been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal terms; and thereby, as did Hiero, a far weaker Prince, have both secured his own Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chief place in his friendship. The issue of the counsel which he followed, will appear soon after this. His first quarrel with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon Conditions that might easily be broken: have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punick War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenor of the League between Him and Carthage: which may seem not unworthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it self then used; though it had been over-long to have been inserted into a more busie piece.

HANNIBAL, General of the CARTHAGINIANS, AND XENOPHANES, Embassador of PHILIP, King of MACEDON.

THIS is the League ratified by Oath, which HANNIBAL, the General, and with him MAGO, MYRCAL, and BARMOCAL, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with XENOPHANES, the Son of CLEOMACHUS, Athenian, whom King PHILIP, the Son of DEMETRIUS, hath sent unto us, for himself, and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo: before † The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules, and Iolaus: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth; before Rivers, and Meadows, and Waters; before all the Gods that have power over Carthage; before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of War, and present at the making of this League. HANNIBAL, the General hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us. That this Oath stand for Friendship and loving Affection, That We become Friends, familiar, and Brethren, upon Covenant, That the safety of the Lords, the Carthaginians, and of HANNIBAL, the General, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, using the same Laws, and of the Uticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Towns and Nations with which We hold Friend- ſhip in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom We ſhall hold Friendſhip, or make Alliance hereafter in this Region; be preſerved by King Philip, and the Macedonians, and ſuch of the Greeks as are their Aſſociates. In like manner ſhall King Philip, and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Aſſociates, be ſaved and preſerved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Aſſociates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or ſhall hereafter joyn with Us in Italy. We ſhall not take counſel one againſt the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readineſs and good Will, without deceit or ſubtilty, We ſhall be Enemies unto the Enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting thoſe Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which we have already League and Friendſhip. VVe alſo ſhall be Enemies to the Enemies of King Philip, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already League and Friendſhip. The War that We have with the Romans, have Ye alſo with them, until the Gods ſhall give us a new and happy end. Ye ſhall aid Us with thoſe things whereof We have need, and ſhall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods ſhall not give unto You and Us their help in this War againſt the Romans and their Aſſociates; then if the Romans offer Friendſhip, We ſhall make Friendſhip in ſuch wiſe, that Ye ſhall be partakers of the ſame Friendſhip, VVith Condition, That they ſhall not have power to make VVar upon you: Neither ſhall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyræans, nor over thoſe of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They ſhall alſo render unto Demetrius Pharius all thoſe that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after ſuch Peace made) ſhall make VVar upon Ye or Us; VVe will ſuccour one another in that VVar, as either ſhall have need. The ſame ſhall be obſerved in VVar made by any other, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities and States, with whom VVe hold already League and Friendſhip. To this League if VVe or Ye ſhall think fit to add or detract, ſuch addition or detraction ſhall be made by our common conſent.

§. IV.

§. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural Vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the Second Punick War. He poysoneth Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

HItherto Philip had carried himself as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his Wisdom, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his medling in the Punick War, proceeded from a Royal greatness of mind, with a desire to secure and increase his own Estate, adding therewithal Reputation to his Countrey. But in this business he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himself to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him, even as he lifted. For the Vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustful, bloody, and tyrannical: desirous of power to do what he lifted, and not otherwise lifting to do what he ought, than so far forth, as by making a fair shew he might breed in men such a good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himself in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policy, to bring the Greeks, that were his Associates, under a more absolute form of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himself deeply wronged if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coachman, with the Reins in his hand, those affections which himself did only seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forreign War) unto domestical objects: than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In process of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governors, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws, to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble. Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be oppressed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the King's assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to work, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governors therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the Multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion the People took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be easie to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs, their guardians, were slain. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgraceful words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best friends; he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do Sacrifice: and Sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use; for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Countrey. Whilst he was therefore sacrificing, and had the Entrails of the Beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the Tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himself. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have soothed him a little; were it only for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his Son. But as Aratus stood doubtful what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this Verdict: If thou be a Southsayer, thou maist go thy ways, and let slip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his Horns. Thus he spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus, unto the Two Horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs hear the Opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his Faith unto the Messenians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, he must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit, then were it far better to depart with his Souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his Friends become his Enemies.

To this good advice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing between him and the Arati; whom he thought more froward than beseemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, he had been dishoneſt with his Son's Wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his own Countreyman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponneſus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refuſed to bear him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That unhoneſt counſels are not ſo profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependents; and ſo they purpoſed to continue. But he would needs have them ſo to remain, whether they purpoſed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his will, he ſeized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid Siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of theſe doings: but thinking himſelf ſtrong enough to do what he liſted, and not ſeeing whence they ſhould procure friends to help them. Thus inſtead of ſetling the Countrey, as his intended Voyage into Italy required; he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilſt he was thus labouring to bind the hands that ſhould have fought for him in Italy: M. Valerius, the Roman, came into thoſe parts; who not only maintained the Epirots againſt him, but procured the Ætolians to break Ch.3. §.12. the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrents whereof we have related before, in place whereto it belonged. In managing whereof, though Philip did the Offices of a good Captain: yet when leiſure ſerved, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former deſire, of oppreſſing the liberty of the Meſſenians; but made another journey into their Countrey, with hope to deceive them, as before. They underſtood him better now than before; and therefore were not haſty to truſt him too far. When he ſaw that his cunning would not ſerve, he went to work by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could do little good; perhaps, becauſe none of his Confederates were deſirous to help him in ſuch an Enterpriſe. In this attempt upon Meſſene he loſt Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counſellor, and Flatterer, not his perverter; as appears by his growing daily more nought in following times. The worſe that he ſped, the more angry he vexed againſt thoſe, that ſeemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore by the Miniſtry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poyſoned old Aratus; and ſhortly after that, he poyſoned alſo the younger Aratus; hoping that theſe things would never have been known, becauſe they were done ſecretly, and the poyſons themſelves were more ſure, than manifeſt in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Proceſſions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Prieſt ordained unto him for that purpoſe; as was accuſtomed unto the Hero's, or men, whom they thought to be tranſlated into the number of the Gods. Hereunto they are ſaid to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have been true; ſince the help of the Devil is never failing to the increaſe of Idolatry.

The loving Memory of Aratus, their Patron, and ſingular Benefactor, could not but work in the Achæans a marvellous diſlike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He ſhall therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counſel for themſelves. At the preſent, the Murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in caſe to ſubſiſt, without his help that had committed it. The Ætolians were a moſt outragious people, great dareers, and ſhameleſs robbers. With theſe the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were ſoon divulged, eſpecially that main point, concerning the diviſion of the purchaſe which they ſhould make; namely, That the Ætolians ſhould have the Countrey and Towns; but the Romans the Spoil, and carry away the people, to ſell for Slaves. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make ſtreight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their uncivil diſpoſition; were much the more averſe from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for ſuch did the Greeks account all other Nations, except their own) to make havock of the Countrey. The ſame conſideration moved alſo the Lacedæmonians, to ſtand off a while, before they would declare themſelves for the Ætolians; whoſe friendſhip they had embraced in the late War. The induſtry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he ſeemed to take of the Achæans, his Confederates, ſufficed to retain them: eſpecially at ſuch time as their own neceſſity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himſelf the Dymæans, by an ineſtimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people whereſoever they might be found, that had been carried away Captive, and ſold abroad for Slaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences paſt; if the malignity of his natural condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to underſtand, that it was the time, and not his Vertue, which cauſed him to make ſuch a ſhew of goodneſs. Among other foul acts, whereof he was not aſhamed, he took Polycratia, the Wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ſerve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of ſuch faults he ſhall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the ſecond time: for of that which happened in this their firſt Invaſion, I hold it ſuperfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen, General of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A Battel between them, wherein Machanidas is ſlain.

IT happens often, that the deceaſe of one eminent man diſcovers the Vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there ſtood up Philopœmen: whoſe notable valour, and great skill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careleſs of ſuch protection, as in former times they had needed againſt the violence of their Neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and having no command, did eſpecial ſervice to Antigonus, at the battel of Sellaſia, againſt Cleomenes. Thence forward until now, he had ſpent the moſt part of his time in the Iſle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and ſeldom or never at peace between themſelves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horſe: wherein he carried himſelf ſo ſtrictly, travailing with all the Cities of the Confederacy, to have his followers well mounted and armed at all pieces: as alſo he ſo diligently trained them up in all exerciſe of ſervice, that he made the Achæans very ſtrong in that part of their forces. Being after choſen Prætor or General of the Nation, he had no leſs care to reform their Military Diſcipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be ſtrong enough to defend it ſelf, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He perſwaded the Achæans to cut off their vain expence of bravery, in apparel, houſholdſtuff, and curious fare, and to beſtow that coſt upon their Arms: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by ſo much were they like to prove the better Souldiers; and ſuitable in behaviour unto the pride of their furniture. They had ſerved hitherto with little light Bucklers, and ſlender Darts, to caſt afar off: that were uſeful in skirmiſhing at ſome diſtance, or for Surpriſes, or ſudden and haſty Expeditions; whereto Aratus had been moſt accuſtomed. But when they came to handy ſtrokes, they were good for nothing: ſo as they were wholly driven to relye upon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopœmen altered this: cauſing them to arm themſelves more weightily, to uſe a larger kind of Shield, with good Swords, and ſtrong Pikes, fit for ſervice at hand. He taught them alſo to fight in cloſe order; and altered the form of their embattailing; not making the Files ſo deep as had been accuſtomed, but extending the Front, that he might uſe the ſervice of many hands.

Eight Months were ſpent of that year, in which he firſt was Prætor of the Achæans; when Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, cauſed him to make trial, how his Souldiers had profited by his diſcipline. This Machanidas was the Succeſſor unto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a ſtrong Army of Mercinaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta; but to hold the City in obedience to himſelf perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achæans, that were favourers of liberty; but to ſtrengthen himſelf by friendſhip of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people alſo of Lacedæmon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achæans, and Macedonians; were in like ſort (all, or moſt of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwiſely. For in ſeeking to take revenge upon thoſe, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordſhip of Peloponneſus; they hindered themſelves thereby from recovering the Maſtery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own ſecurity, and no ſmall hope of good that would follow, ſuffered not Machanidas to be idle; but made him always ready to fall upon his Neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilſt they were enforced, by greater neceſſity, to turn face another way. Thus had he often done, eſpecially in the abſence of Philip: whoſe ſudden coming into thoſe parts, or ſome other oppoſition made againſt him, had uſually made him fail of his Attempts. At the preſent he was ſtronger in Men, than were the Achæans; and thought his own Men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilſt Philip therefore was buſied elſewhere, he entred the Country of the Mantinæans: being not without hope to do as Cleomenes had done before him; yea, and perhaps to get the * Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, as having ſtronger friends, and weaker oppoſition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantinæa; where was fought between them a great battel. The Tyrant had brought into the Field upon Carts, a great many of Engines; wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in diſorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen ſent forth his light Armature a good way before him; ſo as Machanidas was fain to do the like. To ſecond theſe, from the one and the other ſide came in continual ſupply; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Achæans, and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight: being ſo far advanced each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwiſe be diſcerned which preſſed forward, or which recoiled, than by riſing of the duſt. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unſerviceable, by the interpoſition of his own men; in ſuch manner as the Canon is hindered from doing Execution, in moſt of the battels fought in theſe our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well obſerveth) by ſurmounting their oppoſites in degree of courage; wherein uſually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed thoſe that are waged by Free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which live oppreſſed by Tyranny, ſince the one, by doing their beſt in fight, have hope to acquire ſomewhat beneficial to themſelves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to aſſure their own ſervitude: ſo the Mercinaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his proſperity, have good cauſe to maintain his quarrel as their own; whereas they that ſerve under a free State, have no other motive to do manfully, than their bare ſtipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victory; many Companies (if not all) of forreign Auxiliaries are preſently caſt; and therefore ſuch good fellows, will not take much pains to bring the War to an end. But the Victory of a Tyrant, makes him ſtand in need of more ſuch helpers: becauſe that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more Subjects; and therefore ſtands in fear of more, that ſhould ſeek to take revenge upon him. The Stipendaries therefore of the Achæans, being forced to give ground, were urged ſo violently in their retreat by thoſe of Machanidas, that ſhortly they betook themſelves to flight; and could not be ſtaid by any perſwaſions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battel of the Achæans. This diſaſter had been ſufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wiſely obſerved the demeanor of Machanidas, and found in him that Error which might reſtore the Victory. The Tyrant, with his Mercinaries, gave chace unto thoſe that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battel his Lacedæmonians; whom he thought ſufficient to deal with the Achæans, that were already diſheartned by the flight of their Companions. But when this his raſhneſs had carried him out of ſight, Philopœmen advanced towards the Lacedæmonians that ſtood before him. There lay between them athwart the Countrey a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore paſſable (as it ſeemed) without much difficulty, eſpecially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians adventured over it, as thinking themſelves better Souldiers than the Achæans; who had in a manner already loſt the day. But hereby they greatly diſordered their own Battel; and had no ſooner the foremoſt of them recovered covered the further bank, than they were ſtoutly charged by the Achæans, who drave them headlong into the Ditch again. Their firſt ranks being broken, all the reſt began to ſhrink: ſo as Philopœmen getting over the ditch, eaſily chaced them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to uſe his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He ſuffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a ſufficient ſtrength, for the cuſtody of a Bridge that was over the Ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant muſt come back. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked very heavily when he ſaw what was fallen out. Yet with a luſty Troop of Horſe about him He made towards the Bridge: hoping to find the Achæans in diſorder, and to ſet upon their backs, as they were careleſly purſuing their Victory. But when he and his Company ſaw Philopœmen ready to make good the Bridge againſt them; then began every one to look, which way he might ſhift for himſelf. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his Company, rode along the Ditch-ſide; and ſearched for an eaſie paſſage over. He was eaſily diſcovered by his purple Caſſock, and the coſtly trappings of his Horſe. Philopœmen therefore leaving the charge of the Bridge unto another, coaſted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the Ditch it ſelf, as he was getting over it, ſlew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battel on the Lacedæmonians ſide about four thouſand: and more than four thouſand were taken Priſoners. Of the Achæan Mercinaries, probable it is that the loſs was not greatly cared for; ſince that War was at an end, and for their Money they might hire more when they ſhould have need.

§. VI.

Philip having Peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares againſt Aſia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagona, Bithynia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Achæans learned to think well of themſelves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (ſuch was their diſcipline, and continual exerciſe) to account themſelves in matter of War inferiour to any, that ſhould have brought againſt them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great uſe of them: But when he had once concluded Peace with the Romans and Ætolians, He ſtudied how to enlarge his Dominion Eaſtward; ſince the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the Weſt. He took in hand many matters together, or very nearly together, and ſome of them not honeſt: wherein if the Achæans would have done him ſervice; they muſt, by helping him to oppreſs others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themſelves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Ætolians in War againſt him.

This Attalus, though a King, was ſcarce yet a Nobleman, otherwiſe than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune began in Philetærus his Uncle: who being gelded, by reaſon of a miſhap which he had when he was a Child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more eſteemed: as great Men in thoſe times repoſed much confidence in Eunuchs, whoſe affections could not be obliged unto Wives or Children. He was entertained into the Family of Docimus, a Captain following Antigonus the firſt; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Maſter, that betook himſelf to Lyſimachus King of Thrace. Lyſimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truſt with his Money and accompts. But when at length he ſtood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant: He fled into Aſia, where he ſeized upon the Town of Pergamus, and nine thouſand talents belonging to Lyſimachus. The Town and Money, together with his own ſervice, He offered unto Seleucus the firſt, that then was ready to give Lyſimachus Battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus having ſlain Lyſimachus, died ſhortly after himſelf, before he made uſe of Philetærus or his Money. So this Eunuch ſtill retained Pergamus with the Country about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an abſolute King. He had two Brethren: of which the elder is ſaid to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps was not much better; before ſuch time as they were raiſed by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdom to the elder of theſe, or to the Son of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the diſſenſion, between Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the Sons of the ſecond Antiochus. He fought a Battel with Hierax, near unto Sardes; and wan the victory. At which time, to animate his Men againſt the Gaules that ſerved under his Enemy, he uſed a pretty device. He wrote the word * Victorie upon the hand of his Soothſayer, in ſuch colours as would eaſily come off: and when the hot Liver of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the Letters, He publiſhed this unto his Army as a Miracle, plainly foreſhewing that the gods would be aſſiſtant in that Battel.

* Jul. Front. Strat. l. 1. c. 11.

After this victory, he grew a dreadful Enemy to Seleucus: who never durſt attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a ſurfeit of overmuch drink; and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was Son unto Attalus the youngeſt Brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountiful, and no leſs valiant. By his own proper forces He reſtored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was greivouſly moleſted by Achæus: who ſetting up himſelf, as King againſt Antiochus the great, Reigned in the leſſer Aſia. He was beſieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by help of the Tectoſagæ, a Nation of the Gaules, whom he called over out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had loſt. When theſe Gaules had once gotten footing in Aſia, they never wanted employment: but were either entertained by ſome of the Princes reigning in thoſe quarters; or interpoſed themſelves, without invitation, and found themſelves work in quarrels of their own making. They cauſed Pruſias King of Bithynia to ceaſe from his War againſt Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condeſcended; they nevertheleſs within a while after invaded his Kingdom. He obtained againſt them a great victory; and uſed it with great cruelty, ſparing neither age nor ſex. But the ſwarm of them increaſing, they occupied the Region about Helleſpont: where, in ſeating themſelves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheleſs, preſuming afterwards upon their ſtrength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the ſharp exaction whereof, they they had no more respect unto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them; and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themselves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their Neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the Posterity of such as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the slothful reign of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their Line had married with Atossa, Sister unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the Son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at Civil Wars among themselves; recovered his Dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to have issued from the Royal House of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylæmenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the War of Troy. These, applying themselves unto the times, were always conformable unto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reign in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the Great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the less molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captains, made an Expedition into their Country; where he was vanquished. They had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, until the reign of Prusias, whom we have already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Town of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias King of Bythinia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Prusias as a Neigbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthned himself, by taking to Wife the Daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary side, entred into a strict Confederacy with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian War, and was devising with Antiochus about sharing between them two, the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolomy Philopater a friend unto them both was newly dead, and had left his Son Etol Epiphanes a young Child his Heir; the Bithynian entreated this his Father in Law to come over into Asia, there to win the Town of the Cians, and bestow it upon him. Prusias had no right unto the Town, nor just matter of quarrel against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithal rich. Philip came; as one that could not well deny to help his Son in Law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst he lay at the Siege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: entreating him to forsake the Enterprise. He gave dilatory, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request; when he intended nothing less. At length he got the Town: where, even in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardful, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendred himself odious to his Neighbours, as a perfidious and cruel Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poor Cians; and were advertised by Embassadors of purpose sent unto them from Philip, That, howsoever it were in his power to win the Town as soon as he listed: yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, He was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency the Embassadors said, that he would manifest unto the World, what slanderous Tongues they were; which noised abroad such reports, as went of his falshood and oppressions. Whilst the Embassadors were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theatre to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Town of Cios, and after a cruel slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaves of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians took this in great despight, no less were the Ætolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captain to take charge of the Town; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own) what little trust was to be reposed in the Faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moved with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Party in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchasing with much liberality, the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, having lost their own. On the friendship of the Ætolians he had cause to presume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late War with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligeuce with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, He easily drew into a streight alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Upon confidence in these his Friends, but most of all in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open War. It had been unseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to fasten upon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no less manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a Battel at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own Ship on ground, hardly escaping to Land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the Battel took Harbour under a Promontory, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks upon the shore: Yet forasmuch as he had suffered far greater loss of Ships and Men, than had the Enemy: and since he durst not in few days after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the Victory was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wan some Towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to despight his opposites; or whether upon any hopeful desire of conquest, it is uncertain. The stratageme, by which he won Primassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Mine: and finding finding the Earth ſo ſtony, that it reſiſted his work: He nevertheleſs commanded the Pyoniers to make a noiſe under ground; and ſecretly in the night-time he raiſed great Mounts about the entrance of the Mine, to breed an opinion in the beſieged, that the work went marvellouſly forward. At length he ſent word to the Townſmen, that by his under-mining, two Acres of their Wall ſtood only upon woodden Props: to which if he gave fire, and entred by a breach, they ſhould expect no mercy. The Prinaſſians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbiſh by night a great way off, to raiſe up thoſe heaps which they ſaw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the Mine. Wherefore they ſuffered themſelves to be out-faced, and gave up the Town as loſt, which the Enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not ſtay to ſettle himſelf in thoſe parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too ſtrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haſte back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of purſuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, ſeek matter of quarrel againſt Philip. The Athenians, upon ſlight cauſe proclaim War againſt Philip; moved thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns: and makes peremptory anſwer to the Roman Embaſſador. The furious reſolution of the Abydeni.

THeſe Aſiatick matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ſerved well to make a noiſe in Rome; and fill the Peoples heads, if not with a deſire of making War in Macedon, at leaſt with a conceit that it were expedient ſo to do. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the ſtate of thoſe Eaſtern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordſhip of Aſia. Theſe Greeks were factious and ſeldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time and continual dealings in Greece ever ſince the Reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturals: yet moſt of them abhorred his Dominion, becauſe he was originally forſooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had been moſt beholding unto him, were nevertheleſs weary of him, by reaſon of his perſonal faults. All this gave hope, that the affairs of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: eſpecially ſince the diviſions of the Country were ſuch, that every petty Eſtate was apt to take counſel apart for it ſelf; without much regarding the generality. But the poor commonalty of Rome, had no great affection to ſuch a chargeable enterpriſe. They were already quite exhauſted, by that grievous War with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republick all their Money: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive until fifteen or ſixteen years after this, their whole ſum back again. That part of payment alſo which was already made, being not in preſent Money, but much of it in Land: it behoved them to reſt a while; and beſtow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leſs able to beſtow coſt. Wherefore they took no pleaſure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodians had ſent Embaſſadors to ſollicite them againſt Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Aſia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had ſent Letters of the ſame tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by ſetting out the preparations of this dangerous Enemy, that ſollicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Iſlands in thoſe Seas, viſiting them in perſon or ſending Embaſſadors, as one that meant ſhortly to hold War with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no ſuch intent: neither was he much too ſtrong, either of himſelf, or by his alliance in Greece, to be reſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians, eſpecially with the help of the Ætolians their good Friends, and (in a manner) his own profeſſed Enemies. But ſuch things muſt be publiſhed abroad, if only to prediſpoſe men unto the War, and give it the more honeſt colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affairs of thoſe, that were more mighty than himſelf. He was too unskilful, or otherwiſe too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be ſeeking new Enemies. And he found them ſuch, as he deſerved to have them: for he offered his help to their deſtruction, when they were in miſery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have ſtrained his forces to the utmoſt in making War upon them; or, in deſiſting from that injurious courſe, to have made amends for the wrongs paſt, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of Peace which is of all other the moſt natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unleſs they think themſelves juſtly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perſwaded, that he might well be ſecure of the Romans, becauſe of the written Covenants of Peace between him and them. There is not any form of Oath, whereby ſuch Articles of Peace can be held inviolable, ſave only * by the water of Styx, that is, by Neceſſity: which whilſt it binds one party, or both unto performance, making it apparent that he ſhall be a loſer who ſtarts from the Conditions; it may ſo long (and ſo long only) be preſumed that there ſhall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquiſhed, the Romans never hearkned after Philip: for neceſſity made them let him alone. But when once they had Peace with Carthage, then was this River of Styx dryed up: and then could they ſwear, as * Mercury did in the Comedy, by their own ſelves, even by their good ſwords, that they had good reaſon to make War upon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Africk, and the preſent War againſt Attalus; were matter of quarrel as much as needed or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furniſh them with more.

* Sir Fra. Bacon de Sap. veterum.

* Plaut. Amphitr.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took ſtate upon them nevertheleſs, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the days of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the myſteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous Superſtition, vainly ſaid to be available unto felicity after this life) diſcovered themſelves by ſome impertinent queſtions, to be none of thoſe that that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer Error, not thinking to have therein done amiss; yet as it had been for some heinous Crime, they were put to death. All their Countreymen at home took this in ill part; and sought to revenge it as a publick injury, by War upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with Fire and Sword; and carried thence away with them a great booty. This indignity stirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more than they had ability to perform. All which at the present they could do, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happy success against Philip, and entreating him to visit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he understood, that the Roman Embassadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued Enemy to Philip; and he being no less glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the War. The Athenians came forth of their City, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their Wives and Children, in as solemn a pomp as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himself, they omitted no point of observance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first coming into the City, they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them hear him speak. But he excused himself; saying, That with an evil grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did so. The Points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed between him and Philip: lastly, an Exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilst he, with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to do, he protested, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help. There needed little entreaty: for they were as willing to proclaim the War, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That unto the Ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if He were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians, they also decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their Vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of War, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus, and the Rhodians, taking all upon them. But while these were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wan the Towns of Maronea and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing over the Hellespont, he laid siege unto Abydus; and wan it, though he was fain to stay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it self against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither only one Quadrireme Gally: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much upon them.

These Embassadors, C. Claudius, M. Æmylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent unto Ptolemy Epiphanes, King of Ægypt, to acquaint him with their Victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that War; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Ægyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his Reign, which (as his Father Philopator had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thank him, was, That out of Ægypt they had lately been supplied with Corn, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This Message could not but be welcome to the Ægyptian: since it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus, had combined themselves against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Council for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corn: since this their Macedonian Expedition, concerned his Estate no less than theirs.

But as the Errand was for the most part complemental: so had the Embassadors both leisure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmylius, the youngest of them, should step aside, and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Æmylius, coming to Philip, tells him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependancy upon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made War upon him: and that he did only requite them with the like. Do you also (said Æmylius) requite these poor Abydeni with such terrible War, for any the like Invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he roundly made answer to Æmylius; It is your Youth, Sir, and your Beauty; and (above all) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: if ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdom and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no less noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearful Oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable Conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governors and Ancients of the City, to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilſt they were buſie, the Memory of their Oath wrought ſo effectually in the younger ſort; that, by exhortation of their Prieſts, they fell to murdering their Women, Children, and themſelves. Hereof the King had ſo little compaſſion, that he ſaid, he would grant the Abydeni three days leiſure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Town; or hazard themſelves in interrupting the violence of thoſe mad fools.

The Romans decree War againſt Philip, and ſend one of their Conſuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time, both in quality and eſtate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it nearly reſembled; though Rome was not a-like intereſſed in the quarrel. But to help themſelves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the City of Athens: which if the Macedonian ſhould win, then reſted there no more to do, than that he ſhould preſently embark himſelf for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five months, but in the ſhort ſpace of five days ſailing. Thus P. Sulpicius, the Conſul, told the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his firſt propounding they had denied. The Example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged, to ſhew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as alſo the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk; to ſhew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Countrey. By ſuch Arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to believe, that this War with the Macedonian was both juſt and neceſſary. So it was decreed: and immediately the ſame Conſul haſted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readineſs, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives, than the people muſt be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embaſſadors, for their conſtancy (as was ſaid) in not changing their Faith at ſuch time as they ſtood in danger of being beſieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them; though not upon the ſame occaſion. For the people of Rome had no cauſe to think it a benefit unto themſelves, that any Greek Town, refuſing to ſue unto the Macedonian for peace, requeſted their help againſt him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conqueſt of the Eaſtern parts; had reaſon to give thanks unto thoſe that miniſtred the occaſion. Since therefore it was an untrue ſuggeſtion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and ſince neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in thoſe quarters, deſired the Romans to give them protection: theſe buſie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and conſequently with Philip, about a matter of May-game, (as was ſhewed before) ſent Embaſſadors into all parts of the World, even to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus, and other their Neighbours; muſt be accepted as cauſe of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheleſs as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpicius, the Conſul, were ſuch, as might have argued Athens to be the leaſt part of his care. He ſailed not about Peloponneſus, but took the ready way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Apſus, between Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming the Athenian Embaſſadors were with him, and craved his help; whereof they could make no benefit whilſt he was ſo far from them. They bemoaned themſelves as men beſieged, and entreated him to deliver them. For which cauſe he ſent unto them C. Claudius, with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the proſecution of a greater deſign. The Athenians were not indeed beſieged: only ſome Rovers from Chalcis, in the Iſle of Eubœa; and ſome bands of adventurers out of Corinth; uſed to take their Ships, and ſpoil their fields, becauſe they had declared themſelves againſt King Philip, that was Lord of theſe two Towns. The Robberies done by theſe Pirats, and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From ſuch detriment the arrival of Claudius, and ſhortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, eaſily preſerved them. As for the Athenians themſelves; they that had been wont, in ancient times, to undertake the Conqueſts of Egypt, Cyprus, and Sicil; to make war upon the great Perſian King; and to hold ſo much of Greece in ſubjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the reſt: had now no more than three Ships, and thoſe open ones, not much better than long Boats. Yet thought they not themſelves a whit the worſe men; but ſtood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Anceſtors, as if it had been ſtill their own.

§. X.

The Town of Chalcis, in Eubœa, taken and ſackt by the Romans, and their Aſſociates, that lay in Garriſon at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by Surpriſe: waſteth the Countrey about: and makes a journey into Peloponneſus. Of Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his Wife. Philip offers to make War againſt Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he ſpoileth again: and provides againſt his Enemies. Some Exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyn with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the War.

PHilip, returning home from Abydus, heard news of the Roman Conſul his being about Apollonia. But ere he ſtirred forth to give him entertainment; or perhaps before he had well reſolved, whether it were beſt a while to ſit ſtill, and try what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make oppoſition, and reſiſt theſe Invaders with all his forces: He received advertiſement from Chalcis of a grievous miſhap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius, with his Romans, finding no ſuch work at Athens as they had expected, or as was anſwerable to the fame that went abroad; purpoſed to do ſomewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own employment better. He grew ſoon weary of ſitting as a Scare-Crow, to ſave the Athenians grounds from ſpoil; and therefore gladly took in hand a buſineſs of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was negligently guarded by by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Townſmen, who repoſed themſelves upon their Garriſon. Hereof Claudius having advertiſement, ſailed thither by night, for fear of being deſcried; and, arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He uſed no mercy, but ſlew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it (unleſs he ſhould have left the heartleſs Athenians to their own defence,) he ſet it on fire; conſuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all proviſions for War, which were plenteouſly filled. Neither were he and his aſſociates contented with the great abundance of Spoil which they carried aboard their Ships; and with enlarging all thoſe, whom Philip, as in a place of moſt ſecurity, kept there impriſoned: but to ſhew their deſpight and hatred unto the King, they overthrew, and brake in pieces the Statues unto him there erected. This done, they haſted away towards Athens: where the news of their Exploit were like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about ſome twenty miles thence: whither when theſe tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he ſaw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haſte to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their truſty friends, buſie at work in ranſacking the Town, and loading themſelves with ſpoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thouſand light-armed Foot he had with him, and three hundred Horſe: whereof leaving at Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched thence away ſpeedily towards Athens: thinking it not unpoſſible to take his Enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-poſt, that ſtood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not deſcried him a far off, and ſwiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was midnight when this Poſt came thither: who found all the Town aſleep, as fearleſs of any danger. But the Magiſtrates, hearing his report, cauſed a Trumpet out of their Citadel to ſound the Alarm, and with all ſpeed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there: who ſeeing the many lights, and other ſigns of buſie preparation uſual in ſuch a caſe, underſtood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men, to repoſe themſelves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the Walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compaſs about by Sea, and had no cauſe of haſte,) yet having in the Town ſome Mercinary Souldiers, which they kept, of their own, beſides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to iſſue forth at a Gate, whereto they ſaw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all thoſe his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his Example; and preſently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave ſingular proof of his Valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drave them with great ſlaughter back into the City. The heat of his Courage tranſported him further, than diſcretion would have allowed, even to the very Gate. But he retired without harm taken; for that they which were upon the Towers over the Gate, could not uſe their caſting Weapons againſt him, without endangering their own people, that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of Exerciſe, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments beſides, near adjoyning unto Athens: of which he ſpared none, but ſuffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the Sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and ſome Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late, in regard of what was already paſt; but in good time, to prevent him of ſatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Achæans were deviſing upon War, which they intended to make againſt Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being ſtarted up in the room of Machanidas, did greater miſchief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his Mercinaries; and of his Subjects had no regard. He was a cruel Oppreſſor; a greedy Extortioner upon thoſe that lived under him; and one, that in his natural condition ſmelt rankly of the Hangman. In theſe qualities; his Wife Apega, was very fitly matched with him: ſince his dexterity was no greater in ſpoiling the Men, than hers in fleecing their Wives; whom ſhe would never ſuffer to be at quiet, till they had preſented her with all their Jewels and Apparel. Liv. lib. 32. Her Husband was ſo delighted with her property, that he cauſed an Image to be made lively repreſenting her; and apparelled it with ſuch coſtly Garments as ſhe uſed to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, ſerving to torment men. Hereof he made uſe, when he meant to try the vertue of his Rhetorick. Excerpt. è Polyb. l. 13. For calling unto him ſome rich man, of whoſe Money he was deſirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apega ſtood, and there uſe all his art of perſwaſion, to get what he deſired, as it were by good will. If he could not ſo ſpeed, but was anſwered with Excuſes; then took he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who ſate by in a Chair) could perſwade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that roſe up, and opened the Arms, as it were for embracement. Thoſe Arms were full of ſharp Iron Nails, the like whereof were alſo ſticking in the Breaſts, though hidden with her Cloaths: and herewith ſhe griped the poor wretch, to the pleaſure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruel death. Such, and worſe (for it were long to tell all here that is ſpoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By theſe he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopœmens Vertue he ſtood in fear; and therefore durſt not provoke the Achæans, as long as they had ſuch an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a far worſe Captain, was their Prætor; and all, or the greateſt part of their Mercinaries were diſcharged; Philopœmen being alſo gone into Crete, to follow his beloved Occupation of War: then did Nabis fall upon their Territory; and waſting all the Fields, made them diſtruſt their own ſafety in the Towns.

Againſt this Tyrant, the Achæans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them; and had ſet down, what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation ſhould furniſh out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themſelves with the care of this buſineſs; foraſmuch much as he alone would eaſe them of this War, and take the burden upon himſelf. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That whilſt he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns unguarded. In which reſpect, he thought they would be pleaſed, to ſend a few Men to Corinth, and ſome Companies into the Iſle of Eubœa; that ſo he might ſecurely purſue the War againſt Nabis. Immediately they found out his device: which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his War againſt the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him anſwer, That their Laws forbad them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than thoſe for which it was aſſembled. So paſſing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War againſt Nabis; he brake up the Aſſembly, with every mans good liking: whereas in former times, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Paraſites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpoſe with the Achæans. Nevertheleſs he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and ſo returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philocles, one of his Captains, that with two thouſand men, had been doing what harm he might unto the Countrey. With this addition of ſtrength, he attempted the Caſtle of Eleuſine, the Haven of Pyræus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made ſuch haſte after him by Sea, thruſting themſelves into every of theſe places; that he could no more than wreak his anger upon thoſe goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time ſingularly beautified. So he deſtroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble: which they had in plenty, of their own; or, having long ago been Maſters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where beſt choice was found. Neither did he only pull all down: but cauſed his Men to break the very Stones, that they might be unſerviceable to the reparation. His loſs at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made proviſion, both againſt the Roman Conſul that lay about Apollonia; and againſt the Dardanians; with other his bad Neighbours, which were likely to infeſt him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whoſe Parliament, ſhortly to be held at Naupactus, he ſent an Embaſſage; requeſting them to continue in his friendſhip. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius, the Roman Conſul, encamped upon the River of Apſus. Thence he ſent forth Apuſtius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waſte the borders of Macedon. Apuſtius took ſundry Caſtles and Towns; uſing ſuch extremity of Sword and Fire at Antipatria, the firſt good Town which he wan by force, that none durſt afterwards make reſiſtance, unleſs they knew themſelves able to hold out. Returning towards the Conſul with his Spoil, he was charged in Rear, upon the paſſage of a Brook, by Athenagoras, a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of theſe Enemies, took Priſoners many more, to the increaſe of their booty, with which they arrived in ſafety at their Camp. The ſucceſs of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet ſerved to draw into the Roman friendſhip, thoſe that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. Theſe were Pleuratus, the Son of Scerdilaidas, the Illyrian; Aminander, King of the Athamanians; and Bato, the Son of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their aſſiſtance unto the Conſul, who thanked them: and ſaid, That he would ſhortly make uſe of Pleuratus, and Bato, when he entred into Macedon: but that the friendſhip of Aminander, whoſe Countrey lay between the Ætolians and Theſſaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to ſtir them up againſt Philip.

So the preſent care, was wholly ſet upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian ſpake firſt: and ſaid, That as there was nothing fallen out, which ſhould occaſion the breach of Peace between his Maſter and the Ætolians: ſo was it to be hoped, that they would not ſuffer themſelves, without good cauſe; to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to conſider, how the Romans heretofore had made ſhew, as if their War in Greece tended only to defence of the Ætolians: and yet notwithſtanding, had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making Peace with Philip, had no longer need of ſuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them ſo buſie, in obtruding their protection upon thoſe that needed it not? Surely it was even the general hatred, which theſe Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the ſame ſort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuſe, when it was oppreſſed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuſe and Meſſana, were ſubject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the ſame effect he alledged many Examples; adding, That in like ſort it would happen to the Ætolians: who, if they drew ſuch Maſters into Greece, muſt not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to conſult about War and Peace: the Romans would eaſe them of this care, and ſend them ſuch a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuſe. Wherefore he concluded, That it was beſt for them, whilſt as yet they might, and whilſt one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom, if at any time, upon light occaſion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three years ago made the Peace which ſtill continued; although the ſame Romans were then againſt it, who ſought to break it now.

It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good Anſwer to theſe Objections. For the Macedonian had ſpoken the very truth, in ſhewing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with ſuch importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were ſet on by them to ſpeak next: who had ſtore of Eloquence, and matter of Recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. Theſe affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embaſſador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few days paſt, made War upon the Gods themſelves, by deſtroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithal they made a pitiful rehearſal of their own Calamities: and ſaid, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the reſt of Greece, ſhould feel the ſame that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens it ſelf, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the Gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman Arms had not defended them.

Then

Then ſpeak the Romans: who excuſing, as well as they could, their own oppreſſion of all thoſe, in whoſe defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the point in hand. They ſaid, that they had of late made War in the Ætolians behalf, and that the Ætolians had without their conſent made Peace: whereof ſince the Ætolians muſt excuſe themſelves, by alledging that the Romans, being buſied with Carthage, wanted leiſure to give them aid convenient: ſo this excuſe being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent againſt their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their War and Victory, unleſs they had rather periſh with Philip.

It might eaſily be perceived, that they which were ſo vehement, in offering their help ere it was deſired: were themſelves carried unto the War by more earneſt motives, than a ſimple deſire to help thoſe friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cauſe, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor ſhifted them off awhile with a dilatory anſwer: though he told his Countrimen, That by reſerving themſelves, till the mattter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with thoſe that had the better fortune. His anſwer was, firſt, in general terms; That overmuch haſte was an Enemy to good Counſel: for which cauſe they muſt further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming nearer to the matter in hand, He paſſed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Aſſembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this buſineſs; any Law to the contrary notwithſtanding: whereas otherwiſe it was unlawful to treat of ſuch affairs, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at ſet times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmiſhing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHilip was glad to hear, that the Romans had ſped no better in their ſollicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby diſappointed, in the very beginning, of one great help; and meant himſelf to diſappoint them of another. His Son Perſeus, a very Boy, was ſent to keep the ſtreights of Pelagonia againſt the Dardanians; having with him ſome of the Kings Council, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may ſeem, that the preſence of the Kings Son, how young ſoever, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the Enemies; by making them at leaſt believe, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reaſon, why the ſame Perſeus, a few years before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his Father; whom earneſt buſineſs called thence another way. No danger of Enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would ſerve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned; who took his Journey Weſtward againſt Sulpicius the Conſul.

The Armies met in the Countrey of the Daſſaretii, a People in the utmoſt borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North until they joyn in the South with Pindus, incloſe the Weſtern parts of Macedon. Two or three days they lay in ſight the one of the other, without making offer of Battel. The Conſul was the firſt that iſſued forth of his Camp into the open Field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to ſend forth ſome of his light-armed Mercinaries, and ſome part of his Horſe, to entertain them with skirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was ſo, that the King was unwilling to hazard all at firſt upon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his own forces: yet being no leſs unwilling to loſe too much in reputation; He made ſhew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein he beſtowed as many as he thought meet of his Targetiers: and ſo gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; inſtructing both him and the Targetiers, how to behave themſelves reſpectively, as opportunity ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh; having fought upon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him ſo hotly, that they drave him to an haſty flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targetiers, not ſtaying to let them run into the danger, diſcovered themſelves before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the work, to which they were appointed. The Conſul hereby gathered, that the King had ſome deſire to trie the fortune of a Battel: which he therefore preſented the ſecond time; leading forth his Army, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of help which the Romans had never uſed before, but had taken theſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was ſcarce above fourſcore years ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never ſeen any of thoſe Beaſts before. But now the ſame Romans, (whilſt poſſibly ſome were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wiſely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than He. Sulpicius was unwilling to loſe time: neither could he without great danger, lying ſo near the Enemy, that was ſtrong in Horſe, ſend his Men to fetch in Corn out of the Fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: preſuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground; and ſo the more boldly he ſuffered his Forragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing ſorry of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleaſure: even till their preſumption, and his own ſuppoſed fear, ſhould make them careleſs. When this was come to paſs, he took all his Horſe and light-armed Foot, with which he occupied a place in the midway, between the Forragers and their Camp. There he ſtayed in Covert with part of his forces; to keep the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt he ſent abroad the Country, to fall upon the ſtraglers: willing them to put all to the Sword, and let none run home with news to the Camp. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcoure the Fields, lighted all or moſt of them upon the King and his Companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themſelves, raiſed a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon ſends forth all his Horſe, and bids them help their fellowes where they ſaw it needful: He himſelf with the Legions followed. The Companies of Horſe divided themſelves, accordingly as they met with advertiſements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was moſt of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvaſſing the Field, took their task where they found it. But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himſelf. They had the diſadvantage: as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellows alſo might have been, if the King had well bethought himſelf, and given over in time. But while, not contented with ſuch an harveſt, he was too greedy about a poor gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in ſight: which emboldened their Horſe to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own ſafety. They ran which way they could: and (as Men that lye in wait for others, are ſeldom heedful of that which may befal themſelves) to eſcape the Enemy, they declined the faireſt way; ſo as they were plunged in Marſhes and Boggs, wherein many of them were loſt. The Kings Horſe was ſlain under him: and there had he been caſt away, if a loving Subject of his had not alighted; mounted him upon his own Horſe; and delivered him out of peril, at the expence of his own life, that running on foot was overtaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident raſhneſs; and the Conſul, with as much dulneſs; for this days ſervice. A little longer ſtay would have delivered the King from theſe Enemies without any blow: ſince when all the Fields about them were waſted, they muſt needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other ſide it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had ſet upon his Camp, at ſuch time as he fled thither half amazed with fear of being either ſlain or taken; they might have won it. But that noble Hiſtorian Livy, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciouſly obſerved, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this days work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay ſafe in his Camp; and could not be ſo aſtoniſhed with the loſs of two or three hundred Horſe, that it ſhould therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himſelf; He was advertiſed, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the paſſage thereinto open, after Perſeus was called away from cuſtody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do ſomewhat betimes; that he might ſet the Romans going the ſooner, and afterwards look unto his troubleſome Neighbours. In conſideration of this, Philip was deſirous to clear himſelf of the Romans, as ſoon as he might. And to that purpoſe he ſent unto the Conſul; requeſting a day of truce for burial of the dead. But inſtead of ſo doing, he marched away by night; and left fires in his Camp to beguile the Enemy, as if he had not ſtirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not ſlow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of ſtrength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down Trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was moſt open. In making of ſuch places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little uſe; being a ſquare Battel of Pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more ſerviceable in that caſe. But they were few; and their Arrows were of ſmall force againſt the Roman Shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of Stones. But to no purpoſe. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (ſuch as it was) laid open unto the Conſul ſome poor Towns thereabout; which partly were taken by ſtrong hand; partly yielded for fear. But the ſpoil of theſe, and of the Fields adjoyning, was not ſufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themſelves apace out of the Country. The King ſent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilſt he himſelf went againſt the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reſerved himſelf and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again: as alſo that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen upon Macedon; grew no leſs buſie on the ſudden, than before he had been wiſe. He perſwaded his Nation to take their time: and ſo, not ſtaying to proclaim War, joyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invaſion upon Theſſaly. They took and cruelly ſacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they liſted. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay diſperſed, was like to have taken their Camp; if Aminander, more wary than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his own mountainous Country.

About the ſame time; the Roman Fleet, aſſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken ſome ſmall Iſlands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewiſe the Town of Oreum in the Iſle of Eubœa; and ſome other places thereabout. The Towns were given to Attalus, after the ſame Compact that had formerly been made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given to the Romans; and the People for Slaves. Other attempts on that ſide were hindred: either by foul weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Conſul waſtes a year to no effect. War of the Gaules in Italy. An Embaſſy of the Romans to Carthage, Maſaniſſa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is ſent againſt him.

THus the time ran away: and P. Villius, a new Conſul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutiny of his oldeſt Souldiers: whereof two thouſand, having ſerved long in Sicil and Africk, thought themſelves much wronged, in that they could not be ſuffered to look unto their own eſtates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had ſerved at Cannæ: as may ſeem by their complaint, of having been long abſent from Italy; whither fain they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were ſhipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertain. For the Hiſtory of his year is loſt: whereof the miſs is not great; ſince he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Livy, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit againſt Philip. Yet ſince Livy himſelf, an Hiſtorian to whom few of the beſt are matchable, could find no ſuch thing recorded in any good Author; we may reaſonably believe, that Villius his year was idle. Liv. l. 32.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gaules. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and ſtrong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Aſdrubal, had been able to force; was taken by theſe Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like ſort Cremona was attempted; but ſaved her ſelf, taking warning by her Neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that had ſtaied behind Aſdrubal, or Mago, in thoſe parts; was now become Captain of the Gaules, in theſe their enterpriſes. This when the Romans heard, they ſent Embaſſadours to the Carthaginians; giving them to underſtand, That, if they were not weary of the Peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up this their Citizen Amilcar; who made War in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps leſt the meſſage might ſeem otherwiſe to have ſavoured a little of ſome fear) That of the Fugitive Slaves belonging unto the Romans, there were ſome reported to walk up and down in Carthage: which if it were ſo, then ought they to be reſtored back to their Maſters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embaſſadours that were ſent on this Errand, had further charge to treat with Maſaniſſa, as alſo with Vermina the Son of Syphax. Unto Maſaniſſa, beſides matter of complement, they were to ſignifie what pleaſure He might do them, by lending them ſome of his Numidian Horſe, to ſerve in their War againſt the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchſafe unto him the name of King: and promiſed thereafter to deſerve it, by his readineſs in doing them all good offices. But they were ſomewhat ſcrupulous in the matter: and ſaid, That having been, and being ſtill (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought firſt of all to deſire Peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they uſed not to confer upon any, ſave only upon ſuch as had royally deſerved it at their hands. The authority to make Peace with him, was wholly committed unto theſe Embaſſadours upon ſuch terms as they ſhould think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then buſied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle anſwer, That they wholly diſclaimed Amilcar: baniſhing him; and confiſcating his goods. As for the Fugitives, they had reſtored as many as they could find; and would in that point; as far as was requiſite, give ſatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithal they ſent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Maſaniſſa would have lent unto the Romans two thouſand of his Numidian Horſe: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embaſſadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdom; and, without any diſputation, agreed with them upon terms of Peace.

Thus were the Romans buſied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might purſue it ſtrongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules, they laid Seige unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a Battel with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this Battel: and the fruit of the Victory was ſuch, as both made amends for loſſes paſt, and left the work eaſie to thoſe, that afterwards ſhould have the mannaging of War among thoſe Gaules. So was there good leiſure to think upon the buſineſs of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by puniſhing a bad Counſellor whom they hated; as alſo to aſſure unto himſelf the Achæans, by rendring unto them ſome Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to ſtrengthen his Kingdom, not only by exerciſing and trayning his People, but by fortifying the paſſages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a Journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be ſupplied with Victuals, determined at length to trie a new courſe. But then came advertiſement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was choſen Conſul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province, whoſe coming was expected; and he very ſhortly arrived at the Army.

§. XIII.

The Romans began to make War by negotiation. T. Quintius wins a paſſage againſt Philip. Theſſaly waſted by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forſaking the Macedonian take part with the Romans. A treaty of Peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who preſently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after ſuch a trifling manner. It was their uſe, to give Battel to the Enemy, as ſoon as they met with him. If he refuſed it, they beſieged his Towns: and ſo forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his diſadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborn it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his own weakneſs. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learn of the ſubtile Greeks the Art of Negotiation; wherein hitherto they were not grown so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and stood indebted, * many years after this, unto private men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punick War. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian War, and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the Enterprise, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their business went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the less need to rely upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand foot and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius the new Consul into Macedon. Their Navy, and other means could well have served for the setting forth, and transportation of a greater Army; but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many, and too far from home) have bred some Jealousie in their Friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some Friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their Enemies more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the Forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himself unto them by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom against Antiochus who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which more concerned him. Their Answer was remarkable: They said, that it was not their manner to use the aid of their Friends longer then their Friends had good opportunity, and could also be well contented to afford it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, though he were their good Friend, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but that they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common Friends unto both of the Kings) do their best to perswade an attonement between them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves towards their good Friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally, at their entreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded these terms of Friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soon appear.

* Liv. l. 34.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted for the most part, of old Soldiers, that had served in Spain and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his coming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Apsus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seek their way into Macedon through the poor Country of the Dasseretians; or else win, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together mispent their time, and been forced to return back without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly: then should they enter into a plentiful Country; and which, by long dependance upon the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheless the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Apsus, running along through that Valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and unpassable Bog: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main Rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayed to climb in the Mountains: but finding himself disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; He was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing, for the space of forty days.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by composition, upon some reasonable terms. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom he had many Friends) that he and the Consul had a meeting together: But nothing was effected. The Consul would have him to set all Towns of Greece at liberty; and to make amends for the Injuries, which he had done to many People in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give Liberty to those whom he had subdued of late; but unto such as had been long subject unto him and his Ancestors, he thought it against all Reason, that he should relinquish his Claim and Dominion over them. He also said, That as far forth as it should appear, that he had done wrong unto any Town or People whatsoever, he could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seem convenient in the Judgment of some free State, that had not been interessed in those Quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no Judgment or Compromise, forasmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had always been the Invader;. and had not made War, as one provoked, in his own Defence. After this Alteration, when they should come to particulars, and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would have to be set at liberty; the first that he named were the Thessalians. These had been Subjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever since the days of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore as soon as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded what sharper Condition he would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquished. And herewithal abruptly he flang away, refusing to hear any more of such Discourse.

After this, the Consul strove in vain, two or three days together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that Passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himself, and could not resolve what course to take, there came to him an Herdsman, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots, that favoured the Romans, who having long kept Beasts in those Mountains, was throughly acquainted with all By-paths; and therefore undertook to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This Guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great Reward, in case he made good his word; had such Companies, as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moon) and rested in the day-time, for fear of being discovered. When they had recovered the Hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them because at their Backs) they raiſed a great Smoke; whereby they gave notice of their Succeſs unto the Conſul. Some Skirmiſhes, whilſt theſe were on their Journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian, thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third Morning he ſaw the Smoke ariſe more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his Men had attained unto the place whither they were ſent: He preſſed as near as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and aſſailed them in their ſtrength. He prevailed as little as in former times, until the ſhoutings of thoſe that ran down the Hill, and charged Philip on the back, aſtoniſhed ſo the Macedonians, that they betook themſelves to flight. The King, upon firſt apprehenſion of the Danger, made all ſpeed away to ſave himſelf. Yet anon conſidering, that the difficulty of the Paſſage muſt needs hinder the Romans from purſuing him; he made a ſtand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken Troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thouſand men. The greateſt loſs was of his Camp and Proviſions, if not rather perhaps of his Reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to ſtand in fear, leſt being driven from a place of ſuch advantage, they ſhould hardly make good their Party againſt the Enemy upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himſelf much better perſwaded. Wherefore he cauſed the Theſſalians, as many of them as in his haſty retreat he could viſit, to forſake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and ſpoiling all the reſt. But all of them could not be perſwaded thus to abandon (for the pleaſure of their King) their ancient Habitations, and all the ſubſtance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly reſiſted him; which they might the better do, for that he could not ſtay to uſe any great Compulſion. He alſo himſelf took it very grievouſly, that he was driven to make ſuch waſte of a moſt pleaſant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him; ſo that a little hinderance did ſerve to make him break off his purpoſe, and withdraw himſelf home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

Backs)

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readineſs to invade Theſſaly; whereinto the ways lay more open, out of their ſeveral Countries. When therefore they heard for certain, that Philip was beaten by the Romans, they foreſlowed not the occaſion, but made all ſpeed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten ſo much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their Harveſt, could not find enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poor Theſſalians, of whoſe liberty the Romans a few days ſince had made ſhew to be very deſirous, waſted by the ſame Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turn themſelves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by aſſault; Metropolis and Piera yielded unto him. Rhage he beſieged, and having made a fair breach, yet was unable to force it; ſo ſtoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian Garriſon therein. Philip alſo at the ſame time, having ſomewhat recollected his Spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thruſting men into all places that were like to be diſtreſſed. So the Conſul, having well near ſpent his Victuals, and ſeeing no hope to prevail at Rhage, brake up his ſiege, and departed out of Theſſaly. He had appointed his Ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an haven Town of Phocis, on the Gulf of Corinth; which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he preſently invaded; not ſo much for hatred unto the People, as becauſe it lay conveniently ſeated between Theſſaly and other Regions, wherein he had buſineſs, or was ſhortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocis he wan by aſſault; many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within ſhort ſpace he had (in effect) maſtered it all.

In the mean time L. Quintius the Conſul's Brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Eubœa, and afterward laid ſiege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arſenal of the Corinthians on their Eaſtern Sea. This Enterpriſe did ſomewhat help forward the Achæans in their deſire to leave the part of Philip: ſince it might come to paſs, that Corinth it ſelf, ere long time were ſpent, and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very ſhortly, ſhould be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other Motives inducing the Achæans to prefer the Friendſhip of the Romans, before the Patronage of Philip, whereto they had been long accuſtomed. For this King had ſo many ways offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the beſt courſe to rid their hands of him; whilſt being entangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of ſuch Counſel, as they ſhould hold the ſafeſt. His tyrannous Practices to make himſelf their abſolute Lord; his poiſoning of Aratus their old Governour; his falſe dealing with the Meſſenians, Epirots, and other People their Confederates, and his own Dependants; together with many particular Outrages by him committed, had cauſed them long ſince to hold him as a neceſſary Evil, even whilſt they were unable to be without his Aſſiſtance. But ſince, by the Virtue of Philopœmen, they were grown ſomewhat confident in their own ſtrength, ſo as without the Macedonians help, they could as well ſubſiſt, as having him to friend: then did they only think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer neceſſary. It angred him to perceive how they ſtood affected; and therefore he ſent Murderers to take away the life of * Philopœmen. But failing in this Enterpriſe, and being detected, he did thereby only ſet fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopœmen wrought ſo with the Achæans, that no diſcourſe was more familiar with them, than what great cauſe they had to withdraw themſelves from the Macedonians. Cycliadas, a principal man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for ſhewing himſelf paſſionate in the cauſe of Philip, and Ariſtænus choſen Prætor, who laboured to joyn them in Society with the Romans.

* Plut. in vita Philopœm. Juſtin. l. 29.

Theſe News were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embaſſadors were ſent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans, making promiſe, that they ſhould have Corinth reſtored unto them, if they would forſake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sicyon, to deliberate and reſolve in this weighty Caſe. Therein the Romans and their Adherents deſired the Achæans to joyn with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwiſe, the Embaſſadours of Philip, whom he had alſo ſent for this buſineſs, admoniſhing the Achæans of their Alliance with the King, and of their Faith due unto him; requeſted them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate Requeſt of Philip's Embaſſadour, did no way advance his Maſter's Cauſe: rather it gave the Achæans to underſtand, That he who could be ſatisfied with ſo little at their hands, knew himſelf unable to gratifie them in any reciprocal Demand. Yet were there many in that great Council, who remembring the Benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earneſtly for the preſervation of the ancient League. But in fine, the ſenſe of late Injuries, and expectation of like, or worſe from him in the future, prevailed againſt the Memory of thoſe old good turns, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly ſold unto them, and partly had uſed as Baits, whereby to allure them into abſolute Subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the leaſt Importance, that the Romans were ſtrong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much Altercation the Decree paſſed, That they ſhould thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his Enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians they forthwith entred into Society: with the Romans (becauſe no League would be of force, until the Senate and People had approved it) they forbore to decree any Society at the preſent, until the return of thoſe Embaſſadours from Rome, which they determined to ſend thither of purpoſe. The Megalopolitans, Dimæans, and Argives, having done their beſt for the Macedonian, as by many Reſpects they were bound; roſe up out of the Council, and departed before the paſſing of the Decree, which they could not reſiſt, nor yet with Honeſty thereto give aſſent. For this their good will, and greater, which they ſhortly manifeſted, the Argives had ſo little thank, that all the reſt of the Achæans may be the better held excuſed, for eſcaping how they might, out of the hands of ſo fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a ſolemn day at Argos, the Affection of the Citizens diſcovered it ſelf ſo plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partiſans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his Hands, if they might have any ſmall aſſiſtance. Philocles, a Lieutenant of the King's, lay then in Corinth; which he had manfully defended againſt the Romans and Attalus: Him the Conſpirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a ſudden, and finding the Multitude ready to joyn with him, he eaſily compelled the Achæan Garriſon to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and ſome other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his Reputation, ſo they gave him hope to obtain ſome good end by Treaty, whilſt as yet with his Honour he might ſeek it; and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conſul would ſhortly be choſen, who ſhould take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the ſooner. Titus had the like reſpect unto himſelf; and therefore thought it beſt, ſince more could not be done, to diſpoſe things unto a Concluſion, for his own Reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-ſhore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Golf of Ziton, in the Ægæan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian, an Embaſſadour of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his own Captains, and Cycliadas, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achaia. He refuſed to come on ſhore; though fearing (as he ſaid) none but the immortal Gods; yet miſdoubting ſome Treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all Priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewiſe whatſoever he held of theirs in Illyria; and whatſoever about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolemy then King of Ægypt, after his Father's death. Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made entire, of Ships, Towns, and Temples, by him taken and ſpoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have again the Countrey of Peræa, lying over againſt their Iſland; as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of divers Towns about the Helleſpont, and other Havens of their Friends. The Achæans deſired Reſtitution of Argos and Corinth; about the one of which they might not unjuſtly quarrel with him; the other had been long his own by their conſent. The Ætolians took upon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece; willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Countrey, leaving it free; and withal to deliver up unto them whatſoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithal content, but inſolently declaimed againſt him, for that which he had lately done in Theſſaly, corrupting (as they ſaid) the rewards of the victors, by deſtroying, when he was vanquiſhed, thoſe Towns, which elſe they might have gotten. To anſwer theſe malapert Ætolians, Philip commanded his Galley to row near the Shore. But they began to ply him afreſh, telling him, That he muſt obey his Betters, unleſs he were able to defend himſelf by force of Arms. He anſwered them, (as he was much given to gybing) with ſundry Scoffs, and eſpecially with one, which made the Roman Conſul underſtand what manner of Companions theſe Ætolians were. For he ſaid, That he had often dealt with them, as likewiſe the reſt of the Greeks; deſiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take ſpoil from ſpoil; yet could he get no better an Anſwer, than that they would ſooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable cuſtom, as often as War happened between their Friends, to hold up the Quarrel, by ſending Voluntaries to ſerve on both ſides, that ſhould ſpoil both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he ſaid it was ſtrange that the Ætolians ſhould be ſo careful thereof, ſince divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Græcians; wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make Slaves of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat ſmiled; and was no whit offended to hear the Ætolians well ratled up; touching whom, he began to underſtand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of ſetting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beſeem the greatneſs of the Romans; though he would alſo conſider what might beſeem his own Dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petty Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume under Countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might, he ſhould be hereunto compelled; it was, he ſaid, a ſtrange and ridiculous Inſolence. The Achæans he charged with much Ingratitude, reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their own; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than human Honours. Nevertheleſs he ſaid, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himſelf. Thus he addreſſed himſelf wholly to the Roman General; unto whom, if he could give ſatisfaction, he cared little for all the reſt. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late War, (he ſaid) was only defenſive, they having been the offerers; or if he gave them any occaſion, it was only in helping Pruſias, his Son-in-law; neither did he ſee why they ſhould rather ſeek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, That ſpoiling a Temple of Venus, he had cut down the Grove and pleaſant Walks thereabouts; what could he do more than ſend Gardiners thither with young Plants, if one King of another would ſtand to ask ſuch recompence. Thus he jeſted the matter out, but offered, nevertheleſs, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Peræa to the Rhodians; as likewiſe to Attalus the Ships and Priſoners of his, whereof he had then Poſſeſſion. Thus ended that days conference, becauſe it was late; Philip requiring a Night's leiſure to think upon the Articles, which were many; and he ill provided of Counſel wherewith to adviſe about them. For your being ſo ill provided of Counſel, ſaid Titus, you may even thank your ſelf; as having murdered all your Friends, that were wont to adviſe you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night, excuſing his long ſtay by the weightineſs of the things propounded, whereon he could not ſuddenly tell how to reſolve. But it was believed, that he thereby ſought to abridge the Ætolians of leiſure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he deſired Conference in private with the Roman General. The Sum of his Diſcourſe, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give to the Achæans both Argos and Corinth; as alſo that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians what he had promiſed the day before; likewiſe to the Ætolians, that he would grant ſome part of their Demands; and to the Romans whatſoever they did challenge. This when Titus his Aſſociates heard, they exclaimed againſt it, ſaying, That if the King were ſuffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would ſhortly get Poſſeſſion of all which he now rendred up. The noiſe that they made came to Philips ear; who thereupon deſired a third day of meeting, and proteſted, that if he could not perſwade them, he would ſuffer himſelf to be perſwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the Morning; at what time the King entreated them all, that they would with ſincere affection hearken unto good offers of Peace, and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of thoſe Conditions, which he had already tendered; or otherwiſe that they would make truce with him for the preſent, and let him ſend Embaſſadours to Rome, where he would refer himſelf to the courteſie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it, who ſtood in doubt, leſt a new Conſul might happen to defraud him of the Honour, which he expected by ending of the War. So he eaſily prevailed with the reſt to aſſent thereunto; foraſmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for ſervice in the War; and ſince, without authority of the Senate, he ſhould be unable to proceed reſolvedly either in War or Peace. Further he willed them to ſend their ſeveral Embaſſadours to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, ſhould eaſily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their Prejudice. Among the reſt he perſwaded King Aminander to make a Journey to Rome, in perſon, knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of ſo many Embaſſadours, would ſerve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure, that his own Command of the Army in Greece, might be prorogued. And to the ſame end had he dealt with ſome of the Tribunes of the people at Rome, who had already (though as yet he knew not ſo much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reaſons which they alledged unto the Senate.

The Embaſſadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, ſpake bitterly againſt the King, with good liking of the Senate, which was more deſirous of Victory than of Satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpoſe of the Romans, in undertaking to ſet Greece at liberty. But this (they ſaid) could never be effected, unleſs eſpecial care were taken, that the King ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were ſo vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonſtration how thoſe places held all the reſt in ſervility, that the Senate agreed to have it even ſo as they had deſired. When therefore the Embaſſadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration, they were briefly cut off in the midſt of their Preface, with this one demand; Whether their Maſter would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias? Hereto they made anſwer, That concerning thoſe places, the King had given them no Direction or Commiſſion what to ſay or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philip's deſire of Peace, wherein they ſaid he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embaſſadours have truly ſaid, That neither the Ætolians, Achæans, nor any of their Fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias ſhould be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any Claim to either of theſe Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had ſome right, (though their right were no better, than that having ſtolen it from one Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by Bargain unto another) Philip had already condeſcended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even againſt the Greeks in excuſe of the King, by ſome of T. Quintius his Friends, that ſo he might have had the Honour to conclude the War, if a Succeſſor had been decreed unto him. But ſince he was appointed to continue General, neither his Friends at Rome, nor he himſelf, after the return of the Embaſſadours into Greece, cared to give ear unto any talk of Peace.

Philip ſeeing that the Achæans had forſaken him, and joyned with their common Enemies, thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himſelf unto Nabis, whom they hated moſt. There were not many years paſt, ſince the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help than their own ſtrength, had been almoſt ſtrong enough both for the Macedonians and Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force conſiſted in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries, for he was a Tyrant, though ſtiling himſelf King. Yet he ſorely vexed the Achæans, and therefore ſeemed unto Philip one likely to ſtand him in great ſtead, if he could be won. To this purpoſe it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwiſe be eaſily defended, ſhould be conſigned over into his hands, in hope, that ſuch a benefit would ſerve to tie him faſt unto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Maſter's purpoſe to make a ſtreight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giving ſome Daughters of his own in Marriage unto Nabis his Sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made ſome Scru-ple in accepting the Town of Argos; unleſs by decree of the Citizens themſelves, he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argives; but found them ſo averſe, that, in open Aſſembly of the People, they deteſted the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occaſion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philocles, without more ado, to make over the Town, which he was ready to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him poſſeſſion of the ſtrongeſt places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very-love had forſaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the Morning, the Tyrant made himſelf Maſter of all the Gates. A few of the principal men, underſtanding how things went, fled out of the City at the firſt tumult. Wherefore they were all baniſhed, and their Goods confiſcated. The reſt of the chief Citizens that ſtaid behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Alſo a great impoſition of Money was laid upon all thoſe, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were diſmiſſed without more ado. But if any ſtood long upon the matter; or plaid the thieves, in purloyning their own goods, they were put to the Whip, and beſides loſs of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Laws: namely ſuch, as might ſerve to make him gracious with the raſcal Multitude: abrogating all Debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poor. By ſuch art of oppreſſing the great ones, it had been an old cuſtom of Tyrants, to aſſure themſelves of the Vulgar for a time.

As ſoon as Nabis had gotten Argos, he ſent the news to T. Quintius; and offered to joyn with him againſt Philip. Titus was glad of it: ſo as he took the pains to croſs over the Streights into Peloponneſus, there to meet with Nabis. They had ſoon agreed (though King Attalus, who was preſent with the Conſul, made ſome cavil touching Argos,) and the Tyrant lent unto the Romans ſix hundred of his Mercinaries of Crete: as alſo he agreed with the Achæans, upon a Truce for four Months, reſerving the final concluſion of Peace between them until the War of Philip ſhould be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIV.

The Battel at Cynoſcephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquiſhed by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as ſoon as he underſtood that he was appointed to have Command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleaſure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent purſuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his Negotiation of Peace, and no leſs failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War; meant afterwards wholly to relie upon himſelf.

Plut. in vita T. Q. Flam.

Titus had in his Army about ſix and twenty thouſand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others ſtrength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Only Titus heard that Philip was in Theſſaly; and thereupon addreſſed himſelf to ſeek him out. They had like to have met unawares, near unto the City of Pheræ: where the Vant-courriers on both ſides diſcovered each other; and ſent word thereof unto their ſeveral Captains. But neither of them were over-haſty, to commit all to hazard upon ſo ſhort warning. The day following each of them ſent out three hundred Horſe, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better diſcovery. Theſe met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their ſeveral Camps, with little advantage unto either ſide. The Countrey about Pheræ was thick ſet with Trees: and otherwiſe full of Gardens, and Mud-walls; which made it unproper for ſervice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diſlodged, intending to remove back unto Scotuſa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ſerved with all neceſſaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purpoſed alſo to march thitherwards; were it only to waſte the Countrey. There lay between them a great ledg of Hills; which hindered the one from knowing what courſe the other took. Nevertheleſs they encamped not far aſunder, both the firſt and the ſecond night; though neither of them underſtood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempeſtuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then ſent they forth diſcoverers again, in greater number than before. Theſe meeting together, held a long Fight, wherein at firſt the Macedonians had the worſe. But Philip anon ſent in ſuch ſtrong ſupply, that if the reſiſtance of the Ætolians had not been deſparate, the Romans, their fellows, had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all reſiſtance notwithſtanding, the Macedonians prevailed; ſo that Titus himſelf was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little diſcouraged, by the defeat of all their Horſe, to animate thoſe which were in flight.

It was altogether beſides the Kings purpoſe, to put the fortune of a Battel in truſt that day, with ſo much of his Eſtate as might thereon depend. But the news came to him thick and tumultuouſly, how the Enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could uſe an occaſion, the like whereof he ſhould not often find. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattelled his Men; and climbed up thoſe Hills, which for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance unto Dogs Heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynoſcephalæ. As ſoon as he was on the Hill-top; it did him good to ſee, that they of his own light-armature were buſie in fight, almoſt at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled ſo far. He had alſo liberty to chuſe his ground, as might ſerve beſt his advantage: foraſmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great uſe: the roughneſs of the place among thoſe Dogs-heads, as they were called, ſerving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheleſs he found convenient room, wherein to marſhal the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the reſt; embattailing them as they might. Whilſt he was doing this, he perceived that his Horſemen, and light-armature, began to ſhrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legion, by force whereof they were driven to recoyl. He ſets forward to help them; and they no leſs haſtily draw unto him for ſuccour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climb the Hill; Philip commanded thoſe of his Phalanx, to charge their Pikes, Pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx, being a great ſquare battel of armed Pikes, like in all points to thoſe which are now uſed in our modern Wars: and being in like manner uſed, as are ours; was not to be reſiſted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it ſelf held together undiſſolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very cloſe order: ſo that two of them ſtood oppoſite to one of the Romans; as alſo the Pikes of the firſt rank, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvel if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with Ten Enemies at once; and not able to come nearer unto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it; was greatly troubled: for that ſtill the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he obſerved, That they which were appointed by Philip, to make his left Wing, were not able, through the much unevenneſs of the ground, to put themſelves in order: ſo as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or elſe (which was worſe) upon deſire either of beholding the paſtime, or of ſeeming to be partakers in the work, ran fooliſhly along by the ſide of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their diſorder he made great and preſent uſe. He cauſed the right Wing of his Battel to march up the Hill, againſt theſe ill-ordered Troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increaſe the terror. The Macedonians were readier to diſpute what ſhould be done in ſuch a caſe, than well adviſed what to do; as having no one man appointed, to command that part in chief. Indeed if they ſhould have done their beſt, it could not have ſerved; ſince the ground whereon they ſtood, made their Weapons unuſeful. For let it be ſuppoſed, that Philip having ſix and twenty thouſand in his Army (as he is ſaid to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thouſand Horſe, four thouſand Targettiers, and four thouſand light-armed: ſo ſhall there remain fourteen thouſand Pikes; whereof he himſelf had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left Wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having uſually ſixteen in File, muſt, when it conſiſted of ſeven thouſand, have well near four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would ſerve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty, or ſeven and thirty Files, might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foot of ground: this Front muſt have occupied twelve hundred Foot, or two hundred and forty Paces; that is, very near a quarter of a Mile in length. Such a ſpace of open Champain, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that muſt of neceſſity diſjoyn this cloſe battel of the Phalanx; was not every where to be found. Here at Cynoſcephalæ, Philip had ſo much room, as would only ſuffice for the one half of his Men: the reſt were fain to ſtand ſtill, and look about them; being hindered from putting themſelves in order, by the roughneſs of the Dogs heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in maſtring thoſe Enemies, whoſe feet were in a manner bound by the diſcommodity of the place. The very firſt impreſſion of the Elephants, cauſed them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themſelves unto flight. A Roman Tribune, or Colonel, ſeeing the Victory on that part aſſured, left the proſecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Enſigns, or Maniples; that is, (as they might fall out) by ſome two thouſand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the Victory compleat. He conſidered, that Philip, in purſuing the right Wing of the Romans, was run on ſo far; as that himſelf, with his fellows, in mounting the Hill, to charge the left Wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings Head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand; and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rear. The hindmoſt ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed, ſave the firſt five, were accuſtomed, when the Battels came to joyning, to carry their Pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies, to thruſt on their foremen: and ſo were they doing at the preſent. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx, that it ſerved neither for offence nor defence, except only in Front. For though it were ſo, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Meſopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in ſuch order, that all the four ſides of it were as ſo many Fronts, looking ſundry ways, becauſe he expected, that he ſhould be encompaſſed round: yet it is to be underſtood, that herein he altered the uſual form; as alſo at the ſame time he embattelled his men in looſe order, that ſo with eaſe they might turn their Weapons, which way need ſhould require. Likewiſe it is to be conſidered, That Alexander's men being thus diſpoſed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the Enemy, unleſs their hindmoſt ranks could have marched backwards. But in this preſent caſe of Philip, there was no ſuch proviſion for reſiſtance. Therefore his men, being otherwiſe unable to help themſelves, threw down their Weapons, and fled. The King himſelf had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noiſe behind him, and turning a little aſide, with a Troop of Horſe, to ſee how all went: when he beheld his Men caſting down their Weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he preſently betook himſelf to flight. Neither ſtaid he afterwards in any place (except only a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this overthrow) until he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battel, about ſeven hundred: of the Macedonians, about eight thouſand were ſlain, and five thouſand taken Priſoners.

THE Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themſelves; and deſired to have it noiſed through all Greece, That the Victory at Cynoſcephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour.

They

They had gotten indeed the moſt of the booty; by ſacking the Macedonian Camp, whilſt the Romans were buſied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition; purpoſed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as ſlightly, as they thought highly of themſelves. He alſo well perceived, That by uſing them with any extraordinary favour, he ſhould greatly offend the reſt of his Confederates in Greece; who deteſted the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this diſpleaſure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battel, Titus made haſte unto Lariſſa, a City of Theſſaly; which he preſently took. Before his coming, Philip had ſent thither one of his Courtiers, to burn all his Letters, and paſſages whatſoever in writing, betwixt him and others, of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of ſo much adverſity, he forgot not to provide for the ſafety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lariſſa might well perceive, that he gave them as already loſt. Wherefore we find not that they, or any of their Neighbours, did make delay of opening their Gates to Titus. At the ſame time, the Town of Leucas bordering upon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet: and very ſoon after all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip; gave up themſelves unto the Romans, hearing of the Victory at Cynoſcephalæ. The Rhodians alſo were then in hand with the Conqueſt of Peræa, a Region of the Continent over-againſt their Iſland; whereof they had demanded reſtitution, in the late Treaty of Peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks: foraſmuch as they awaited not the good leiſure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and ſome help which they borrowed of the Achæans, and other their friends, gave battel to Dinocrates, the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the Victory, and conſequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worſe than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdom; waſting and ſpoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their diſcretion. This made him gather an Army in all haſte, of ſix thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe: wherewith coming upon them, he drave them, with little or no loſs of his own, and great ſlaughter of theirs, haſtily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Theſſalonica.

In this one Enterpriſe, he had ſucceſs anſwerable to his deſire: but ſeeing what bad fortune accompanied his affairs, in all other parts at the ſame time, he thought it wiſdom to yield unto neceſſity; and therefore ſent in all haſte Limnæus and Demoſthenes, with Cycliadas, the baniſhed Achæan, in whom he repoſed much confidence, Embaſſadors unto Titus. Theſe had conference a long while in private, with Titus, and ſome of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wiſe diſmiſſed. It ſeems that they had Commiſſion to refer all unto Titus his own diſcretion; as Philip himſelf in few days after did. There was granted unto them a Truce for fifteen days: in which time, the King himſelf might come and ſpeak with the Roman General. In the mean ſeaſon many ſuſpicious rumors went of Titus; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of theſe bruits the Ætolians were chief Authors: who being wont to regard neither friendſhip nor honeſty, where profit led them a wrong way, judged a-like of all men elſe. But againſt the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had ſent Letters unto his Aſſociates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty ſhould be held. There when they were all aſſembled, they entred into conſultation before the Kings arrival, what ſhould be moſt expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every Eſtate in particular. The poor King Aminander, beſought them all, and eſpecially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and conſidering his weakneſs, which he confeſſed, make ſuch proviſion, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him, who was not able to reſiſt. Then ſpake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus for ſo much as he had thus aſſembled the Confederates, to adviſe upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpoſe which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither aſſure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he ſaid, none other end to be made of the War, which could agree either with the purpoſe of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the fair promiſes made by Titus himſelf unto the Greeks, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect he made a long diſcourſe. But Titus anſwered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleaſure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable cuſtoms which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to ſeek the utter deſtruction of any King or Nation, at ſuch time as they firſt made War with them; until by ſome rebellion they found it a matter of neceſſity, to take ſuch a rigorous courſe. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable Example: adding, That Victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement unto moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece: it was (he ſaid) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedon ſhould be greatly weakned and brought low; not that it ſhould be utterly deſtroyed: foraſmuch as it ſerved as a bar, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other ſavage Nations, which would ſoon overflow the whole Continent of Greece, if this Kingdom were not interpoſed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yield unto thoſe demands wherewith he had preſſed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reaſon to deny him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwiſe, it ſhould be at their own pleaſure, to take counſel apart for themſelves, as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, an other of the Ætolians, to ſay, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no leſs than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leave his babling; ſaying, That himſelf would take ſuch order, as that Philip, were he never ſo deſirous, ſhould thenceforth not have it in his power to moleſt the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus uſed friendly: and ſuffering him to repoſe himſelf that night, held a Council the day following: wherein the King yielded unto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further, to ſtand to the good pleaſure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas, the Ætolian, inſulting over him, ſaid it was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of the Towns (which he there na-named) bidding him ſpeak, whether he would, or not. His anſwer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoſing himſelf, ſaid, it ſhould be otherwiſe; Theſe were Theſſalian Towns, and ſhould all be free: one of them only excepted, which not long ago had refuſed to commit it ſelf to the faith of the Romans, and therefore ſhould now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to defraud them of the Towns that had ſometime belonged unto their Common-weal. Rather he willed Titus to conſider, that by an ancient Covenant between them and the Romans, all the Towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing, ſave the Pillage and Captives. It is true, that there had been ſuch a Condition in the former War: but it ceaſed to be of any validity, as ſoon as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to underſtand; asking them, whether they thought it reaſonable, that all the Towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compoſition, ſhould be delivered into ſubjection of the Ætolians. The reſt of the Confederates were very much delighted, with theſe angry paſſages between the Roman and the Ætolians: neither had they great reaſon, to fear any hard meaſure; ſince Titus was ſo earneſt in behalf of thoſe Theſſalians, to give them liberty, though they had ſtood out againſt him, even till very fear made them open their Gates. Wherefore they oppoſed not themſelves; but gave their conſent willingly unto a Truce for four Months.

The chief cauſe that moved Titus to grant peace ſo readily to the Macedonian, beſides that laudable cuſtom by him before alledged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Army from Syria, and drawing near toward Europe. He had alſo perhaps yet a greater motive; even the conſideration, that his Succeſſor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War ſhould happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his Letters, together with Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, and ſundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Conſuls were choſen: who, (eſpecially the one of them) ſtood very earneſtly againſt the Peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own ſuſpicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embaſſadors of Philip offering to ſtand to whatſoever was demanded, and the Letters of Titus preſſing them to accept this offer, on the one ſide; and the importunity of the Conſul on the other; who ſaid, that all theſe goodly ſhews were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as ſoon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an aſſembly of the people; by whoſe ſovereign authority it was concluded, That Peace ſhould be granted unto the King. So Ten Embaſſadors were ſent from Rome over into Greece: in which number were they, that had been Conſuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, That Titus ſhould go through with the buſineſs of Peace. Theſe would very fain have retained thoſe three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, until the ſtate of Greece were ſomewhat better ſettled. But finally Titus prevailed ſo, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred unto the Achæans; and all the other Greek Towns which Philip held, as well in Aſia as in Greece, reſtored unto liberty.

The Conditions of the Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Iſthmian Games, he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of all the Greek Towns which he held; and conſign them over to the Romans: That he ſhould deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewiſe all his Ships of War, reſerving to himſelf only five of the leſſer ſort, and one of extraordinary greatneſs, wherein ſixteen men laboured at every Oar: Further, that he ſhould pay a thouſand talents, the one half in hand, the other in Ten years next following, by even portions. Hereto * Livy adds, That he was forbidden to make War out of Macedon, without permiſſion of the Senate. But I find not that he obſerved this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred Talents he had already delivered unto Titus, together with his younger Son Demetrius, to remain as hoſtage for his true dealing in this matter of Peace, at ſuch time as he lately ſent his Embaſſadors to Rome: when it was promiſed, that the Money, and his Son, ſhould be reſtored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleaſed with the agreement. Whether this Money were reckoned as part of the thouſand Talents, I cannot find: and it ſeemeth otherwiſe, foraſmuch as young Demetrius, who together with thoſe four hundred Talents, was given for hoſtage, remained ſtill in cuſtody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters alſo were then ſent by Titus, unto Pruſias, King of Bithynia: giving him to underſtand, what agreement was made with Philip, in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reaſonable, that the Ciani, moſt miſerably ſpoiled and oppreſſed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian, his Son in-law, ſhould be reſtored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the ſame benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect theſe Letters wrought, it was not greatly material; ſince the Romans were ſhortly buſied with Antiochus, in ſuch wiſe, that they had not leiſure to examine the conformity of Pruſias to their will.

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargain, which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themſelves agrieved, that they were utterly neglected; which was to the reſt no ſmall part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occaſioned much trouble unto themſelves. There were ſome among them well-affected to the Romans: who ſeeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus; ſaying, that they were no better than loſt, for the good will which they had born unto him; unleſs at this time, when he lay cloſe by them with his Army, their Prætor which was head of the oppoſite Faction, might be made away. Titus refuſed to have an hand in the Execution; yet nevertheleſs did animate them in their purpoſe. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themſelves undiſcovered. But when the Murder came out, and ſomewhat was confeſſed by thoſe that were put to torture; the hatred of the people brake out violently againſt the Romans; in ſuch wiſe, that howſoever they durſt not take Arms againſt them, yet ſuch of them as they found ſtragling from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the Countrey. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to have the Murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred Souldiers, which he had loſt by them, to have paid unto him five hundred Talents. Inſtead of making any ſuch amends, they paid him with Excuſes; which he would not take as good ſatisfaction. He ſends Embaſſadors to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requeſted them not to take it amiſs, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithal he falls to wasting their Countrey, and besiegeth two such Town of theirs, as did seem to be most culpable of the Murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians, (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this War; yet besought him rather to grant Peace unto the Bœotians) prevailed so far with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were known offenders.

* Polyb. excerpt. Legat. 9.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worse Neihgbour. The Ætolians would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian War served as an introduction to the War to be made in Asia against Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other Victories. Wherefore to stay the progress of bad rumors, when the Isthmian Games were held, which in time of peace were never without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great Assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and People of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at liberty, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to hear it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own Ears. The Greeks were Crafts-Masters in the art of giving thanks; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of all the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans in their War against Antiochus, than could have been the possession of a few Towns; yea, or of all those Provinces which were named in their Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof; no sooner were these Isthmian Games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Council, gave audience to Hegesianax, and Lysias, King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with War; as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not pass over his Army into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talk with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisdom to offend over-much, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed unto the Thessalians; all save the Town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Council might favour them; yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despight of Titus. To the Achæans were restored Corinth, Tripbylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus, the Illyrian, were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this War; to reign in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their own Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Council, would have given the Towns of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his Son and Successor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these, as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Orestis, a little Province of the Kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made a free Estate by it self.

These businesses being dispatcht, it remained, that all care should be used, not how to avoid the War with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himself, to pick matter of quarrel; and about unto others, to præ-dispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I refer unto another place.

Chap. V.

§. I.

What King's, of the Races of Seleucus and Ptolemy, reigned in Asia and Ægypt before Antiochus the Great.

Polyb. lib. 2.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his Race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slain by Ptolemy Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is said) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I never have read that any Mans life hath been preserved, or any mischance avoided, by the predictions of such Deviliſh Oracles. Rather I believe, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, have been antedated by their Priests or by others; which devised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the Son and Heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his Father: who surrendered up unto him his own Wife Stratonica, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemy Ceraunus had great cause to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with fair words; containing himself within Asia, and letting Ceraunus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that revenge; whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had Wars with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captains of the Gaules, were set upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great Battel: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he won the Victory. He took in hand an enterprise against Ptolemy Philadelphus: but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldæan dedicated his History of the Kings of Assyria; the same, which hath since been excellently falsified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one Son, called Antiochus Theos; and one Daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth year of the Kingdom of the Greeks; when he had reigned nineteen years.

Genebrard. lib. 2. Just. Mart. in Paren.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos or the God, had this vain and impious title given unto him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitless, War with Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Ægypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to Wife Berenice the Daughter of Ptolemy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings Daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth. Dan. c. 11. v. 6.

Ptolemy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own Sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that Race. It was He, that built and furnished with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, and to honour the more, He sent unto Eleazar, then high Priest of the Jews, for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews, had formerly been very great: for He had set at liberty as many of them, as his Father held in slavery throughout all Ægypt; and he had sent unto the *Temple of God in Hierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew Coppy: which Ptolemy caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons, that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the seventy two Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy; Jesus the Son of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to have been one: who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Jansenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as [h] Josephus affirms) by Aristæus that was employed therein. Forty years Ptolemy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloved of his People; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had been in his former years: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise, the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his own errour. He was the first of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among those Royal Families, which by them was rooted up.

* Aug de Civ. Dei. L. 18. C. 42.

[h] Jos. an. l. 12. C. 2. Concerning that Book which now goes under the name of Aristæus; many learned Men, and among the rest Lodovicus Vives, hold suspition that it is counterfeit, and the invention of some later Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in the time of Vives; it may be now much more justly suspected, since a new Edition of it is come forth, purged from faults (as the Papists term those Books, wherein they have changed what they please) and set forth by Middendorpius at Colen. An Dom. 1578. Just. L. 27.

Antiochus Theos had another Wife, called Laodice, at ſuch time as he married with Berenice the Daughter of this Ptolemy. After his ſecond marriage, he uſed his firſt Wife with no better regard, than if ſhe had been his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventured not to ſeek revenge; until her own Son Seleucus Callinicus, was of ability to be King. This was two or three years after the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus: at what time ſhe poyſoned her Husband Theos; and by permiſſion of Seleucus her Son, murdered Berenice, together with a Son that ſhe had born to Antiochus. Juſtin reports, that Berenice ſaved herſelf, together with the young Prince her Child, awhile in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only ſome Cities of Aſia prepared to ſuccour her, but her Brother Ptolemy Euergetes, King of Ægypt, came to reſcue her with an Army; though too late, for ſhe was ſlain before.

With ſuch cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, ſucceeding unto his Father that had fifteen years been King, began his Reign. His Subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature, which they diſcovered in his firſt entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Eſtate would have been much endangered, if Ptolemy Euergetes, who came againſt him, had not been drawn back into his own Country, by ſome Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would bear Arms againſt Ptolemy, in defence of their own King: but rather they ſided with the Ægyptian; who took Laodice the Kings Mother, and rewarded her with death as ſhe had well deſerved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invaſion, by occaſion of thoſe domeſtical troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Ægypt, went about a dangerous piece of work, even to make War upon his own Subjects, becauſe of their bad affection towards him; when as it had been much better, by well deſerving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furniſhing and manning whereof he was at ſuch charges, that he ſcarce left himſelf any other hope, if that ſhould miſcarry. Herein he embarqued himſelf; and, putting to Sea, met with ſuch a tempeſt, as devoured all ſave himſelf, and a very few of his friends that hardly eſcaped. This calamity, having left him nothing elſe in a manner than his naked Body, turned nevertheleſs to his great good; as anon after it ſeemed. For when his Subjects underſtood, in what ſort the Gods (as they conceived it) had puniſhed him for his offences: they had commiſeration of his eſtate; and, preſuming that he would thenceforth become a new Man, offered him their ſervice with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him with ſuch ſpirit; as thinking himſelf well enough able to deal with the Ægyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpoſe. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had been at Sea. He was vanquiſhed by Ptolemy in a great Battel: whence he eſcaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late Shipwrack. Haſting therefore back to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemy would ſoon be at his Heels; He wrote unto his Brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Aſia, praying him to bring ſuccour with all ſpeed; and promiſing, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Aſia. Antiochus was then but fourteen years old, yet extreamly ambitious; and therefore glad of ſuch an occaſion to make himſelf great. He levied a mighty Army of the Gaules; wherewith he ſet forwards to help his Brother; or rather to get what he could for himſelf. Hereof Ptolemy being advertiſed: and having no deſire to put himſelf in danger more than needed; took Truce with Seleucus for ten years. No ſooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Ægyptian War, but his Brother Antiochus came upon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himſelf to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquiſhed again; and ſaved himſelf, with ſo few about him, that he was verily ſuppoſed to have periſht in the Battel. Thus did Gods juſtice take revenge of thoſe murders, by which the Crown was purchaſed; and ſetled (as might have been thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was glad to hear of his Brothers death; as if thereby he had purchaſed his hearts deſire. But the Gaules, his Mercinaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them againſt Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conqueſt in the beginning of his Reign: theſe perfidious Barbarians took Counſel againſt him; and deviſed how to ſtrip him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royal Houſe to make head againſt them; it would be in their power, to do what ſhould beſt be pleaſing to themſelves, in the lower Aſia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ranſom himſelf with Money, as if he had been their lawful Priſoner. Neither were they ſo contented; but made him enter into ſuch Compoſition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the mean while Seleucus had gathered a new Army; and prepared once more to trie his fortune againſt his Brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the ſeaſon fit for himſelf, to make his profit of their diſcord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvel; ſince he had great reaſon to ſtand in no leſs fear of the Gaules his own Souldiers, than of the Enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes wan much in Aſia; whilſt Antiochus went againſt his Brother. In the ſecond Battel, fought between the Brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawk, (which ſurname was given him, becauſe he ſought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) ſoared away as far as he could, both from his Brother, and from his own Gaules. Having fetcht a great compaſs through Meſopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his Father in Law King Artamenes took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward ſhew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he ſoon perceived: and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he reſolved to beſtow himſelf upon Ptolemy: his own conſcience telling him, what evil he had meant unto Seleucus, his Brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can find no ſure harbour. Ptolemy well underſtood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in cloſe Priſon: whence though by means of an Harlot he got out; yet flying from his Keepers, he fell into the hands of Thieves, by whom he was murdered. Near about the ſame time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled againſt him, during his Wars with his Brother. He therefore made a Journey againſt Arſaces founder of the Parthian Kingdom: wherein his evil fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered ſo cloſely to him, that he was taken Priſoner. Arſaces dealt friendly with him, and diſmiſſed him, having every way given him royal entertainment: but in returning home home, he break his neck by a fall from his Horſe, and ſo ended his unhappy Reign of twenty years. He had to Wife Laodice, the Siſter of Andromachus one of his moſt truſty Captains: which was Father unto that Achæus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became ſhortly after (as he ſtiled himſelf) a King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in thoſe parts. By Laodice he had two Sons; Seleucus the third, ſurnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned only three years: in which time he made War upon Attalus the firſt, that was King of Pergamus. Being weak of Body through ſickneſs, and in want of Money, He could not keep his Men of War in good order: and finally he was ſlain by Treaſon of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was revenged by Achæus, who ſlue the Traitors, and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wiſely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the Brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his Reign. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Ægypt. War between Antiochus and Philopator. The Rebellion of Molo; and Expedition of Antiochus againſt him. The recontinuance of Antiochus his Ægyptian War: with the paſſages between the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemy; and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his Rebellion; his greatneſs, and his fall. Antiochus his Expedition againſt the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings Reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

ANtiochus was ſcarcely fifteen years old, when he began his Reign, which laſted ſix and thirty years. In his Minority, He was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious Man; and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful ſervants. This vile quality in a Counſellor of ſuch great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himſelf; the ſucceſs of things will ſhortly diſcover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his Reign, Ptolemy Euergetes King of Ægypt died; and left his Heir Ptolemy Philopator, a young Boy likewiſe, as hath elſewhere been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achæans; who afterwards took part with Cleomenes; and lovingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene; by taking to Wife Berenice, the Daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the laſt good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Ægyptians; not ſo much for the great ſpoils which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered ſome of thoſe Images or Idols, which Cambyſes, when he conquered Ægypt, had carried into Perſia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Onias their high Prieſt, out of meer covetouſneſs of Money, refuſed to pay unto him his yearly tribute of twenty Talents: but he was pacified by the wiſdom of Joſephus a Jew; unto whom afterwards he let in farm the Tributes and Cuſtoms, that belonged unto him, in thoſe parts of Syria which he held. For Cœleſyria, with Paleſtina and all thoſe parts of the Country that lay neareſt unto Ægypt, were held by the Ægyptian; either as having fallen to the ſhare of Ptolemy the firſt, at ſuch time as the great Antigonus was vanquiſhed and ſlain in the Battel at Ipſus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troubleſome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Callinicus. The Victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that laſted for many ſucceeding Ages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecy before cited, which is expounded by St. Hierome. This Ptolemy Euergetes Reigned ſix and twenty years; and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may ſeem by that, which we find in the Prologue unto Jeſus the Son of Sirach his Book, that he ſhould have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there ſaith, that he came into Ægypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his Father: or that thoſe eight and thirthy years, were the years of Jeſus his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did other whiles reckon) from ſome notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes: Hermias the Councellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War againſt the Ægyptian; for the recovery of Cœleſyria and the Countries adjoyning. This Counſil was very unſeaſonably given; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into Rebellion, and ſought to make himſelf abſolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheleſs Hermias, being more froward than wiſe, maintained ſtifly, that it was moſt expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to ſend forth againſt a rebellious Captain other Captains that were faithful; whilſt He in perſon made War upon one, that was like himſelf a King. No Man durſt gainſay the reſolution of Hermias; who therefore ſent Xenætas an Achæan, with ſuch forces as he thought expedient, againſt the Rebel; whilſt in the mean ſeaſon an Army was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Cœleſyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and ſo over the Deſarts into the Vally of Marſyas, between the Mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus; found his way there ſtopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that ſerved under Ptolemy. So he conſumed the time there awhile to none effect: and then came news, that Xenætas, his Captain, was deſtroyed with his whole Army; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenætas, whilſt he was yet on his Journy, and drew near to the River of Tigris; received many advertiſements, by ſuch as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the moſt part, againſt their wills, drawn by their Commander to bear Arms againſt the King. This report was not altogether falſe; but Molo himſelf ſtood in ſome doubt leſt his followers would leave him in time of neceſſity. Xenætas therefore making ſhew, as if he had prepared to paſs the River by Boats in face of his Enemy: left in the night time ſuch as he thought meet to defend his Camp; and with all the flour of his Army went over Tigris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and ſent forth his Horſe to give impediment; but hearing that Xenætas could not ſo be ſtopped,

He

He himſelf diſlodged, and took his Journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as diſtruſting the faith of his own Souldiers: or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy; the great folly of Xenetas made his ſtratagem proſperous. For Xenetas, having born himſelf proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now preſume, that all ſhould give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of uſing the Sword. Wherefore he ſuffered his Men to feaſt, with the proviſions which they found ready in the forſaken Camp: or rather he commanded them ſo to do, by making Proclamation, That they ſhould cheriſh up themſelves againſt the Journey, which he intended to take next day, in purſuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the ſame purpoſe he buſied himſelf, in tranſporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other ſide of Tigris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could eaſily return the ſame night. Wherefore underſtanding what good rule the Kings Men kept: he made ſuch haſte back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilſt they were yet heavy with the Wine and other good chear, that they had ſpent at Supper. So Xenetas and a very few about him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the reſt were ſlaughtered, without making reſiſtance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewiſe the Camp on the other ſide of Tigris, was eaſily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to ſave their own lives. In the heat of this victory, the Rebel marched unto Seleucia, which he preſently took: and, maſtering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Country down to the Red Sea, or Bay of Perſia, He haſted unto Suſa: where at his firſt coming he wan the City: but failing to take the Caſtle that was exceeding ſtrong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this buſineſs.

The report of theſe things coming to Antiochus, whilſt he lay (as is ſaid before) in the Vale of Marſyas: filled him with great ſorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took Counſel what to do in this needful caſe; and was well adviſed by Epigenes the beſt Man of War he had about him, to let alone this Enterpriſe of Cæleſyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This Counſel was put in execution with all convenient haſte. Yet was Epigenes diſmiſſed by the way, and ſoon after ſlain, by the practice of Hermias: who could not endure to hear good Counſel given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the Journey againſt Molo, the name and preſence of the King was more available, than any odds which he had of the Rebel in ſtrength. Molo diſtruſted his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good ſucceſs, or any other conſideration, would ſerve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his perſon. Wherefore he thought it ſafeſt for him, to aſſail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this; He was diſcovered by ſome that fled over from him to the King. This cauſed him to return back to his Camp: which, by ſome error, took alarm at his return; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in ſight. The King was thus forward in giving Battel to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few Men, or Enſigns: but all the left wing of the Enemy, which was oppoſite unto the King, changed ſide forthwith as ſoon as ever they had ſight of the Kings perſon; and were ready to do him ſervice againſt Molo. This was enough to have won the victory: but Molo ſhortned the work, by killing himſelf; as did alſo divers of his friends, who for fear of torments prevented the Hang-man with their own Swords.

After this victory came joyful news, that the Queen Laodice, Daughter of Mithradates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a Son. Fortune ſeemed bountiful unto the King: and therefore he purpoſed to make what uſe he could, of her friendly diſpoſition while it laſted. Being now in the Eaſtern parts of his Kingdom, He judged it convenient to viſit his Frontiers; were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counſellor Hermias gave aſſent: not ſo much reſpecting the Kings honour; as conſidering what good might thereby happen to himſelf. For if it ſhould come to paſs, that the King were taken out of the world by any caſuality: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthening his own Government. Antiochus therefore went againſt Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greateſt part of his Kingdom, ſituate between the Caſpian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearful; and therefore yielded unto whatſoever Conditions it pleaſed Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this Journey Antiochus got honour, ſuch as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Phyſician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious he was unto the People; and how dangerous he would be ſhortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus believed this, having long ſuſpected the ſame Hermias; but not daring, for fear of him, to utter his ſuſpitions. It was therefore agreed, that he ſhould be made away on the ſudden: which was done; he being trained forth by a ſleight a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or diſputation. The King needed not to have uſed ſo much art, in ridding his hands of a Man ſo much deteſted. For howſoever he ſeemed gracious whilſt he was alive: yet they that for fear had been moſt obſequious to him, whilſt he was in caſe to do them hurt, were as ready as the foremoſt, to ſpeak of him as he had deſerved; when once they were ſecure of him. Yea his Wife and Children, lying then at Apamea, were ſtoned to death by the Wives and Children of the Citizens; whoſe indignation brake forth the more outragiouſly, the longer that it had been concealed.

About theſe times, Achæus (of whom we ſpeak before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to periſh in ſome of thoſe Expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to ſet a Diadem upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpoſe was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the Enterpriſe; and ſtudy to ſet ſome handſome colour on his former preſumption. It is very ſtrange, that Antiochus neither went againſt Achæus; nor yet diſſembled the notice which he had taken, of theſe his traiterous purpoſes: but wrote unto him, ſignifying that he knew all; and upbraiding him with ſuch infidelity, as any offendor might know to be unpardonable. By theſe means he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by ſtrong hand, than to excuſe them, or get pardon by ſubmiſſion. Antiochus had at that time a vehement deſire to recover Cæleſyria or what elſe he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemy Philopator in thoſe parts.

He

he began with Seleucia, a very ſtrong City near unto the mouth of the River Orontes, which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with Bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia; but Seleucus getting it ſhortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemy Euergetes having lately won it, might, if it had ſo pleaſed him, have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men that hope to purchaſe an endleſs memorial unto their Names, by works proceeding rather from their greatneſs, than from their Vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the ſame greatneſs hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had oppoſed himſelf to Antiochus, and defended Cœloſyria in the behalf of Ptolemy, was now grown ſorry that he had uſed ſo much faith and diligence in ſervice of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercenary, he began to have regard unto his own profit; which thinking to find greater, by applying himſelf unto him that was (queſtionleſs) the more worthy of theſe two Kings; he offered to deliver up to Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilſt he was deviſing about this Treaſon, and had already ſent Meſſengers to King Antiochus, his practice was detected, and he beſieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemy's Captains, that was more faithful than himſelf. But Antiochus haſting to his reſcue, vanquiſhed this Captain who met him on the way, and afterwards got Poſſeſſion, not only of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in thoſe Havens, but of ſo many other Towns in that Countrey, as emboldened him to think upon making a Journey into Egypt it ſelf. Agathocles and Soſibius bore all the ſway in Egypt at that time, Ptolemy himſelf being loth to have his Pleaſures interrupted with buſineſs of ſo ſmall importance, as the ſafety of his Kingdom. Wherefore theſe two agreed together to make proviſion as haſtily, and yet as ſecretly as might be, for the War; and nevertheleſs, at the ſame time to preſs Antiochus with daily Embaſſadours to ſome good Agreement. There came in the heat of this buſineſs, Embaſſadours from Rhodes, Bizantium, and Cyzicus, as likewiſe from the Ætolians, according to the uſual courteſie of the Greeks, deſiring to take up the Quarrel. Theſe were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Soſibius; who entreated them to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilſt this Treaty laſted, great Preparations were made at Alexandria for the War, wherein theſe two Counſellors perſwaded themſelves reaſonably, that the Victory would be their own, if they could get for Money a ſufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how deſirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet; whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the Diſpoſition of Ptolemy, but becauſe the Rhodians, and other Embaſſadours, coming from Memphis, diſcourſed unto him all after one manner; as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles and his Fellow. Antiochus therefore having wearied himſelf at the long Siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win; and being deſirous to refreſh himſelf and his Army in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on, granted unto the Egyptian a Truce for four Months, with promiſe that he would be ready to hearken unto equal Conditions, when they ſhould be offered. It was not his meaning to be ſo courteous, as he would fain have ſeemed, but only to lull his Enemies aſleep, whilſt he took time to refreſh himſelf, and to bring Achæus to ſome good order, whoſe Treaſon daily grew more open and violent. The ſame negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have uſed, he uſed himſelf; as preſuming, that when time of the year better ſerved, little force would be needful, for that the Towns would voluntarily yield unto him, ſince Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Nevertheleſs he gave audience to the Embaſſadours, and had often conference with thoſe that were ſent out of Egypt, pleaſing himſelf well to diſpute about the Juſtice of his Quarrel, which he purpoſed ſhortly to make good by the Sword, whether it were juſt or no. He ſaid, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Anceſtor, and Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, ſhould be given in Poſſeſſion to Seleucus; and that this Bargain was afterwards ratified by general Conſent of all the Confederates after the Battel at Ipſus. But Ptolemy's men would acknowledge no ſuch Bargain. They ſaid, That Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, had won Cœloſyria and the Provinces adjoyning, for himſelf; as alſo that he had ſufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilſt neither of them greatly cared for Peace, they were in the end of their Diſputation as far from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded reſtitution; Antiochus thought that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Alſo Ptolemy would needs have Achæus comprehended in the League between them, as one of their Confederates; but Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming againſt it as a ſhameful thing, that one King ſhould offer to deal ſo with another, as to take his Rebel into Protection, and ſeek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Sovereign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the Field again, contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemy with a very puiſſant Army, was coming up againſt him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountred on the way by thoſe Captains of Ptolemy, that had reſiſted him the year before. They held againſt him the Paſſages of Libanus, whence nevertheleſs he drave them; and proceeding onward in his Journey, wan ſo many places that he greatly increaſed his Reputation, and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his Followers. As the two Kings drew near together, many Captains of Ptolemy forſook his Pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithſtanding, the Egyptian had the Courage to meet his Enemy in the Field. The Battel was fought at Raphia, where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Aſiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the ſtrength of both Armies conſiſted in Mercinaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Arſinoe his Siſter and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other ſide, each of them rehearſing the brave deeds of their Anceſtors, as not having of their own, whereby to value themſelves. Antiochus had the more Elephants; as alſo his being of Aſia, had they been fewer, would have beaten thoſe of Africk. Wherefore by the advantage of theſe Beaſts, he drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the Battel wherein he fought himſelf. But Ptolemy had the better men, by whoſe valour he brake the Groſs of his Enemy's Battel, and wan the Victory, story, whilſt Antiochus was heedleſly following upon thoſe, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the Field above ſeventy thouſand Foot, and ſix thouſand Horſe, whereof though he loſt ſcarce ten thouſand Foot, and not four hundred Horſe, yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all thoſe places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch, he began to ſtand in fear, leſt Ptolemy and Achæus, ſetting upon him both at once, ſhould put him in danger of his whole Eſtate. This cauſed him to ſend Embaſſadours unto the Egyptian to treat of Peace, which was readily granted; it being much againſt the nature of Ptolemy to vex himſelf thus with the tedious buſineſs of War. So Ptolemy having ſtaid three months in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror, to the great Admiration of his Subjects, and of all thoſe thoſe that were acquainted with his voluptuous and ſlothful Condition.

Achæus was not compriſed in the League between theſe two Kings; or if he had been included therein, yet would not the Egyptian have taken the pains of making a ſecond Expedition for his ſake. The beſt was, that he thought himſelf ſtrong enough, if fortune were not too much againſt him, to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reaſon. For beſides his many Victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this ſide of Taurus, he had alſo good ſucceſs againſt Attalus King of Pergamus, that was an able man of War, and commanded a ſtrong Army. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebel had been, one of mean regard otherwiſe, and carried beyond himſelf by apprehending the vantage of ſome opportunity; but Couzen-german to the King, as hath been ſhewed before, and now lately the King's Brother-in-law, by taking to Wife a younger Daughter of the ſame Mithridates King of Pontus, which was alſo called Laodice, as was her Siſter the Queen, Antiochus his Wife. Theſe things had added Majeſty unto him, and had made his Followers greatly to reſpect him, even as one to whom a Kingdom was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, that King Ptolemy of Egypt held him in the nature of a Friend; and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquiſhed in the Battel at Raphia, and had thereby loſt all his gettings in Syria. But all theſe hopes and likelihoods came to nothing. For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that Quarrel between his Sons-in-law, had no reaſon to take part againſt the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not only ſlothful, but hindred by a Rebellion of his own Subjects, from helping his Friends abroad. For the People of Egypt, of whom Ptolemy, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to ſerve in the late Expedition, began to entertain a good opinion of their own Valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refuſed to ſuffer as much as formerly they had done, ſince they leſs eſteemed, than they had done, the force of the King's Mercenary Greeks, which had hitherto kept them in ſtreight Subjection. Thus brake out a War between that King and his Subjects, wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemy thereby waſted much of his ſtrength, and much of his time, that might have been ſpent, as he thought, much better in revelling; or, as others thought, in ſuccouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, he had no ſooner made his Peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of War againſt Achæus. To this purpoſe he entred into League with Attalus, that ſo he might diſtract the Forces of his Rebel, and find him work on all ſides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were ſuch, that within a while he had pent up Achæus into the City of Sardes, where he held him about two years beſieged. The City was very ſtrong, and well victualled, ſo as there appeared not, when the ſecond year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the firſt years ſiege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Caſtle it ſelf was upon a very high Rock, and in a manner impregnable; as alſo the Town-wall adjoyning to the Caſtle, in that part which was called the Saw, was in like manner ſcituated upon ſteep Rocks, and hardly acceſſible, that hung over a deep bottom, whereinto the dead Carkaſes of Horſes and other Beaſts, yea, and ſometimes of men, uſed to be thrown. Now it was obſerved by Lagoras, That the Ravens and other Birds of prey, which haunted that place by reaſon of their Food, which was there never wanting, uſed to flie up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the Walls, where they reſted without any diſturbance. Obſerving this often, he reaſoned with himſelf, and concluded, That thoſe parts of the Wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King, who approved his Judgment, and gave unto him the leading of ſuch men, as he deſired for the accompliſhing of the Enterpriſe. The Succeſs was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived; and, though with much labour, yet without reſiſtance, he ſcaled thoſe Rocks, and (whilſt a general Aſſault was made) entered the Town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the ſame place had the Perſians under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes, when Cræſus thought himſelf ſecure on that ſide. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a loſs many ages paſt, and therefore out of memory. Achæus held ſtill the Caſtle, which not only ſeemed by nature impregnable, but was very well ſtored with all neceſſaries, and manned with a ſufficient number of ſuch as were to him well aſſured. Antiochus therefore was conſtrained to waſte much time about it, having none other hope to prevail, than by famiſhing the incloſed. Beſides the uſual tediouſneſs of Expectation, his buſineſs called him thence away into the higher Aſia, where the Bactrians, and Parthians, with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they ſtill encroached. But he thought it not ſafe to let Achæus break looſe again. On the other ſide, there were ſome Agents of Ptolemy the Egyptian, and good Friends unto Achæus, that made it their whole Study how to deliver this beſieged Prince. If they could reſcue his perſon, they cared for no more; but preſumed, that when he ſhould appear in the Countries under Taurus, he would ſoon have an Army at command, and be ſtrong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work, as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the ways in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult paſſages among thoſe Rocks whereon the Caſtle of Sardes ſtood. Him they tempted with great Rewards, which he ſhould receive at the hands of Ptolemy, as well as of Achæus; to do his beſt for the Performance of their deſire. He undertook the buſineſs, and gave ſuch likely reaſons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus by one Arianus a truſty meſſenger, whom Bolis found means to conveigh into the Caſtle. The Faith of theſe Negotiators tiators Achæus held moſt aſſured. They alſo wrote unto him in privy Characters, or Cyphers, wherewith none ſave he and they were acquainted; whereby he knew, that it was no feigned device of his Enemies, in the name of his Friends. As for the Meſſenger, he was a truſty Fellow, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected unto the ſide. But the Contents of the Epiſtle, which were, That he ſhould be confident in the Faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus, whom Bolis had won unto the buſineſs, did ſomewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown; and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus, under whom he had the Command of thoſe Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Caſtle of Sardes. Nevertheleſs, other way to eſcape he ſaw none, than by putting himſelf to ſome adventure. When the Meſſenger had therefore paſſed to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himſelf ſhould come ſpeak with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the reſt, ſave only by Bolis and Cambylus, which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrymen, * ſome few excepted, have been, and ſtill are) falſe Knaves. Theſe two held a conſultation together, that was, as † Polybius obſerves it, rightly Cretical, neither concerning the ſafety of him whoſe deliverance they undertook, nor touching the diſcharge of their own faith; but only how to get moſt, with leaſt ado and danger to themſelves. Briefly they concluded, That firſt of all they would equally ſhare between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand; and then that they would reveal the matter to Antiochus, offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with preſent Money and with promiſe of conſideration anſwerable to the greatneſs of ſuch a ſervice, when it ſhould be diſpatched. Antiochus hearing this promiſe of Cambylus, was no leſs glad, than were the Friends of Achæus well pleaſed with the comfortable promiſes of Bolis. At length, when all things were in readineſs on both ſides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Caſtle, and convey Achæus thence, he firſt went with Cambylus to ſpeak with the King, who gave him very private audience, and confirmed unto him by word of mouth, the aſſurance of his liberal Promiſes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honeſt man, and of one that was faithful unto Ptolemy, whom he long had ſerved, he accompanied Arianus up into the Caſtle. At his coming thither, he was lovingly entertained, yet queſtioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the buſineſs in hand. But he diſcourſed ſo well, and with ſuch gravity, that there appeared no reaſon of diſtruſting either his Faith or Judgment. He was an old Souldier, had long been a Captain under Ptolemy, and did not thruſt himſelf into this buſineſs, but was invited by honourable and faithful men. He had alſo taken a ſafe courſe in winning (as it ſeemed) that other Countryman of his, who kept a Fort that ſtood in their way; and thereby had already ſundry times given ſafe paſſage and repaſſage unto Arianus. But againſt all theſe comfortable hopes, the importance of ſo great an Adventure ſtirred up ſome Diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wiſely, and ſaid, That he would yet ſtay in the Caſtle a little longer, but that he meant to ſend away with Bolis three or four of his Friends, from whom when he received better Advertiſement concerning the likelihood of the Enterpriſe, then would he iſſue forth himſelf. Hereby he took order not to commit himſelf wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But, as Polybius well notes, he did not conſider, that he plaid the Cretian with a man of Crete; which is to ſay, that he had to do with one, whoſe Knavery could not be avoided by circumſpection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their Plot thus; That if Achæus came forth alone, then ſhould he eaſily be taken by the Ambuſh prepared for him; if he were accompanied with many of his Friends, then ſhould Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; and Bolis following behind, ſhould have an eye upon Achæus, to prevent him not only from eſcaping in the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwiſe killing himſelf; to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Preſent. And in ſuch order came they now forth. Arianus going before as guide, the reſt following as the way ſerved, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpoſe, till the very inſtant of his departure. Then ſignified he the matter to his Wife Laodice, and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his eſpecial Friends to bear him company. They were all diſguiſed, and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek Tongue, ſpeaking and anſwering as need ſhould require, for all, as if the reſt had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deviſing upon his buſineſs, and much perplexed. For (ſaith Polybius) though he were of Crete, and prone to ſurmiſe any thing to the miſchief of another, yet could he not ſee in the dark, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himſelf were there. The way was very uneaſie, and in ſome places dangerous; eſpecially to thoſe that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to ſtay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occaſion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus, lending him their hands, and taking ſuch care of him, as eaſily gave Bolis to underſtand, that he was the man; and ſo by their unſeaſonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whiſtled, and preſently claſped Achæus about the middle, holding him faſt that he ſhould not ſtir. So they were all taken by the ambuſh, and carried forthwith to Antiochus, who ſate up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The ſight of Achæus brought in bound unto him, did ſo aſtoniſh the King, that he was unable to ſpeak a word, and anon break out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the Plot, which might have kept him from admiration; as alſo the next Morning betimes aſſembling his Friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death; which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of Calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him theſe tears, as alſo the rarity of the Accident, that made both him and his Friends to wonder; though it be ſo, that ſuch a Courſe as this of his, in employing two miſchievous Knaves againſt one Traitor, doth not rarely ſucceed well, according to that Spaniſh Proverb, A un Traydor dos allevoſos. The death of Achæus brought ſuch aſtoniſhment upon thoſe which held the Caſtle, that after a while they gave up the place and themſelves unto the King, whereby he got entire Poſſeſſion of all to him belonging in the leſſer Aſia.

Some years paſſed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition againſt the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obſcure beginnings, and commonly ſubject unto thoſe that ruled in Media. In the great ſhuffling for provinces after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard, shortly they fell to Eumenes, then to Antigonus, and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus, under whose Posterity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustful insolency of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished, and thought to be slain by the Gaules, did stir up Arsaces, a Noble man of the Countrey, to seek revenge of Injuries done, and animate him to rebel. So he slew the King's Lieutenant, made himself King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings, and took Seleucus Callinicus Prisoner in battel, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wan Reputation as a lawful King, and by good Government of his Countrey, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his Successors, like as that of the Ptolemy's in Egypt, and that of the Cæsar's afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled, though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucidæ beyond Euphrates, encreased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Army, that they durst not meet him in plain field, but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and Passages of Mountains. The resistances they made, availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well sorted, as he needed not to turn out of the way from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights between their Mountains; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get above the Enemies heads, or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often employ against them his light armature, wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Arsaces, the second of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own Subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad ways, and deserts, would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey without proceeding much further. This not so falling out, He caused the Wells and Springs in the Wilderness, through which his Enemy must pass, to be dammed up and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himself out of the way: suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey; wherein, without some Victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, that Arsaces was nothing strongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania; where he wan Tambrace the chief City of that Province. This indignity and many other losses, caused Arsaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a Battel. The issue thereof was such, as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arsaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiss, to make him a Friend, whom he could not make a Subject.

* Among theſe few I do not except one, calling himſelf Eudæmon John Andrew, a Cretan, who in one of his late ſhameleſs Libels, wherein he traduceth our King, Religion, and Country, with all the good and worthy men, of whom he could learn the names; hath by inſerting my name, twice belyed me, in calling me a Puritan, and one that have been dangerous unto my Soveraign. It is an honour to be ill ſpoken of by ſo diligent a Supporter of Treaſons, and Architect of Lyes; in regard whereof I may not deny him the commendation of Creticiſm, no leſs voluminous than he in multiplicity of name is beyond any the Cretans in elder times, that were always Lyers, evil Beaſts, and ſlow bellies.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors; but having gotten the Kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it to himself. With Euthydemus he fought a Battel by the River Arius, where he had the Victory. But the Victory was not so greatly to his Honour, as was the Testimony which he gave of his own private Valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned himself more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Army. His Horse was slain under him: and he himself received a wound in his Mouth, whereby he lost some of his Teeth. As for Euthydemus; he withdrew himself back into the further parts of his Kingdom; and afterwards protracted the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjustly usurped from him; Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the Children of the Usurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should joyn, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his own weariness, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant peace upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the Son of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embassador in this Treaty of Peace; was not a little available unto a good Conclusion. For Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in Marriage one of his own Daughters: and therewithal permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdom; causing him nevertheless to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to bind himself by Oath to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the Borders of India: where he renewed with Sophagasenus, King of the Indians, the Society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his War against Antigonus, raised part of his Forces out of their Country. But when Antigonus after his Victory turned Westward, and was over-busied in a great Civil War: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stir up his Countrymen to Rebellion; making himself their Captain, and taking upon him as Protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he soon changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Majesty of a King. Finally he got unto himself, (having an Army of six hundred thousand Men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had been Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himself, ere Seleucus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himself, at the coming of Seleucus: but met him in Field, as ready to defend his own; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both Peace and Affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdoms, was continued by some Offices of love between their Children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon by the Indian King, to an hundred and fifty: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kings.

Neither

Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many Generations, any buſineſs worthy of remembrance with the Weſtern Countries. The poſterity of Sandrocottus, is thought to have retained that Kingdom unto the days of Auguſtus Cæſar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, ſent Embaſſadors with Preſents, and an Epiſtle written in Greek: wherein, among other things, he ſaid, That he had command over ſix hundred Kings. There is alſo found, ſcattered in ſundry Authors, the mention of ſome which held that Kingdom, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Conſtantine the Great: being all peradventure of the ſame Race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophagaſenus, carried himſelf as the worthier perſon, receiving Preſents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with ſuch reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Aſia, but on the hither ſide of Taurus, humbled themſelves unto him, and called him The Great: ſaw an end of his own Greatneſs within few years enſuing, by preſuming to ſtand upon points with the Romans; whoſe Greatneſs was the ſame in deed, that his was only in ſeeming.

§. III.

The lewd Reign of Ptolomy Philopator in Ægypt: with the tragical end of his Favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomy Epiphanes, the Son of Philopator. His irreſolution in preparing for divers Wars at once. His Voyage toward the Helleſpont. He ſeeks to hold Amity with the Romans, who make friendly ſhew to him; intending nevertheleſs to have War with him. His doings about the Helleſpont; which the Romans made the firſt ground of their quarrel to him.

THis Expedition being finiſhed; Antiochus had leiſure to repoſe himſelf a while, and ſtudy which way to convert the terror of his puiſſance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolemy Philopator died: leaving his Son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his Succeſſor in the Kingdom; unlikely by him to be well defended, againſt a Neighbour ſo mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemy, ſurnamed Philopator, that is to ſay, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that ſurname given him in meer deriſion; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years, being newly paſt his childhood when he began to reign, may ſeem to diſcharge him of ſo horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beaſtlineſs of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any miſchief, whereof he could be accuſed. Having won the battel at Raphia, he gave himſelf over to ſenſuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet, called Agathoclea. At her inſtigation he murdered his own Wife and Siſter; which had adventured herſelf with him, in that only dangerous Action by him undertaken, and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-Ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatſoever, were wholly referred unto the diſpoſition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenanthe, a filthy Bawd, that was Mother unto them both. So theſe three governed the Realm at their pleaſure, to the great grief of all the Countrey, till Philopator died: who having reigned Seventeen years, left none other Son than Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Arſinoe, that was his Siſter and Wife. After the Kings death, Agathocles began to take upon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Governor of the Land. He aſſembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary Forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of thoſe that abode in Ægypt with Ptolemy the firſt, and would not be accounted Ægyptians; as neither would the Kings themſelves) and bringing forth unto them his Siſter Agathoclea, with the young King in her arms, began a ſolemn Oration. He told them, That the deceaſed Father of this their King, had committed the child into the arms of his Siſter, but unto the Faith of them: on whoſe valiant right hands, the whole ſtate of the Kingdom did now relie. He beſought them therefore, that they would be faithful, and, as great need was, defend their King againſt the Treaſon of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterouſly went about to ſet the Diadem upon his own head, being a meer ſtranger to the Royal Blood. Herewithal he produced before them a Witneſs, that ſhould juſtifie his accuſation againſt Tlepolemus. Now though it were ſo, that he delivered all this with a feigned paſſion of Sorrow, and counterfeiting of Tears: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he ſpake; but ſtood laughing, and talking one to another, what a ſhameleſs diſſembler he was, to take ſo much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And ſo brake up the Aſſembly: He that had called it, being ſcarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wiſe nor well qualified; thought to go to work, as had formerly been his manner, by uſing his authority, to the ſuppreſſion of thoſe that he diſtruſted. He haled out of a Temple the Mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and caſt her into Priſon. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accuſtomed to ſuffer greater things, whilſt they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their minds; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, againſt theſe three pernicious miſgovernors of the old King. Beſides their conſideration of the preſent injury done to Tlepolemus, they were ſomewhat alſo moved with fear of harm; which, in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to do unto the City. For he was, though a man moſt unapt for Government, as afterwards he proved; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Army. It was alſo then in his power, to ſtop the proviſion of Victuals, which was to come into Alexandria. As theſe motives wrought with the people: ſo by the remedy which Agathocles uſed, were the Macedons more haſtily, and more violently ſtirred unto uproar. He ſecretly apprehended one of their number, whom he ſuſpected of Conſpiracy againſt him; and delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poor Souldier was carried into an inner room of the Palace, and there ſtripped out of all his apparel, to be tormented. But whilſt the Whips were brought forth, and all things even in a readineſs for that purpoſe: there was brought unto the Miniſter of Agathocles, a ſad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room; leaving Mœragenes, the Souldier, alone by himſelf, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveighed himſelf out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians; of whom he found ſome in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turks Janizars. Being aſſured therefore, that one of their fellows had thus been uſed; they fell to Arms in a great rage, and began to force the Palace; crying out, That they would ſee the King, and not leave him in poſſeſſion of ſuch a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the City, with loud clamors, made no leſs a-do than the Souldiers, though to leſs effect. So the old Bawd, Oenanthe, fled into a Temple: her Son and Daughter ſtaid in the Court, until the King was taken from them; and they, by his permiſſion, which he eaſily gave, and by appointment of thoſe that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the fury of the people. Agathocles himſelf was ſtabbed to death, by ſome which therein did the office of Friends; though in manner of Enemies. His Siſter was dragged naked up and down the ſtreets, as was alſo his Mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of juſtice, biting them, pulling out their Eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

Theſe troubles in Ægypt, ſerved well to ſtir up King Antiochus; who had very good leiſure, though he wanted all pretence, to make War upon young Ptolemy. Philip of Macedon had the ſame deſire, to get what part he could of the Child's Eſtate. But it happened well, that Ptolemy Philopator, in the Punick War, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Ægyptians addreſſed themſelves, and craved help againſt theſe two Kings: who though they ſecretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into covenant, to divide between them, all that belonged unto this Orphan; whoſe Father had been Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus, was ſent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Ægypt; eſpecially againſt Antiochus. As for the Macedonian, he was very ſoon found buſied, with War at his own doors. Alſo Scopas, the Ætolian, being a Penſioner to the Ægyptian, was ſent into Greece, to raiſe an Army of Mercinaries. What Lepidus did in Ægypt, I do not find: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was ſent thither only one of the three Embaſſadors, ° in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been ſhewed before. As for Scopas, he ſhortly after went up into Syria with his Army: where winning many places, among the reſt of his Acts, he ſubdued the Jews; who ſeem to have yielded themſelves a little before unto Antiochus, at ſuch time as they ſaw him prepare for his War, and deſpaired of receiving help from Ægypt. But it was not long, ere all theſe Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Euſebius) the ſame year that Philip was beaten at Cynoſcephalæ; Antiochus vanquiſhed Scopas in battel, and recovered all that had been loſt. Among the reſt, the Jews with great willingneſs returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

Vide Joſeph. ant. Jud. l. 12 c. 3.

The Land of Ægypt this great King did forbear to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to beſtow a Daughter of his own in Marriage upon Ptolemy: either hoping, as may ſeem, that the Countrey would willingly ſubmit it ſelf unto him, if this young child ſhould happen to miſcarry; or elſe that greater purchaſe might be made in the Weſtern parts of Aſia, whilſt Philip was held overlaboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much diſtracted; hunting (as we ſay) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Attalus, Philip, and the Greeks, promiſed to afford him great advantage, if he ſhould bring his Army to the Helleſpont. On the other ſide, the ſtate of Ægypt being ſuch as hath been declared, ſeemed eaſie to be ſwallowed up at once. One while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jews among the reſt, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Ægyptian) to yield him obedience. An other while, letting Ægypt alone, he was about to make invaſion upon Attalus his Kingdom; yet ſuffered himſelf eaſily to be perſwaded by the Roman Embaſſadors, and deſiſted from that Enterpriſe. Having thus far gratified the Romans; he ſends Embaſſadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity between him and them. It is not lightly to be over-paſſed, That theſe his Embaſſadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and diſmiſſed, with a Decree and Anſwer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this anſwer of the Romans was not ſincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their own intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great Wars at once. Wherefore, not ſtanding much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour; they were content to give good words for the preſent. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria: and ſhortly prepares to win ſome Towns elſewhere, belonging unto Ptolemy; yet withal he ſends an Army Weſtward, intending to make what profit he can of the diſtractions in Greece. Likewiſe it is conſiderable, as an argument of his much irreſolution, how notwithſtanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdoms, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemy, and another to Eumenes, the Son of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: ſeeking each of their friendſhips, at one and the ſame time, when he ſought to make each of them a ſpoil. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once: being carried with an inexplicable deſire of repugnancies; which is a diſeaſe of great, and over-ſwelling fortunes. Howſoever it was, he ſent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his own Sons: willing them there to ſtay for him; whilſt he himſelf, with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other Veſſels, intended to paſs along by the Coaſts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in ſuch places as held for the Ægyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilſt the War of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this great Antiochus. They ſent unto him a proud Embaſſage: whereby they gave him to underſtand, That if he paſſed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cicilia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrel of theirs unto him; but becauſe he ſhould not joyn with Philip their Enemy, and help him againſt the Romans. It was inſolently done of them, neither ſeemed it otherwiſe, to preſcribe ſuch limits unto the King; yet he tempered himſelf, and without any ſhew of indignation, gave a gentle anſwer; partly himſelf to their Embaſſadors; partly unto their whole City, by Embaſſadors which he thither ſent. He ſhewed his deſire, to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Anceſtors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, leſt his coming ſhould tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans, whom they thought that he would moleſt: they were (he ſaid) his very good friends; whereof, he thought, there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and anſwer by them newly given to his Embaſſadors.

The

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning people, and ſuch as could foreſee what weather was like to happen. This anſwer of the King, and the relation of what had paſſed between his Embaſſadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit; when they were informed ſhortly after, that the Macedonian War was ended at the battel of Cynoſcephalæ. They knew that Antiochus his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the ſtronger ſide. Wherefore they would not be contented to ſit ſtill; unleſs the Towns on the South Coaſt of Aſia, belonging to Ptolemy, their Friend and Confederate, were ſuffered to be at quiet. Herein alſo they did well: for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the Race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of neceſſity gave what aid they could unto all the Subjects of the Ægyptian in thoſe parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the Son of Attalus, prognoſticate as concerning the War that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to beſtow one of his daughters upon him in Marriage; he excuſed himſelf, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetærus, his brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would ſurely make War upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he ſaid, That by abſtaining from this affinity, it ſhould be in his power to joyn with the Romans, and ſtrengthen himſelf greatly with their friendſhip. Contrariwiſe, if he leaned to Antiochus: as he muſt be partaker in his overthrow; ſo was he ſure to be oppreſſed by him, as by an overmighty neighbour, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himſelf wintered about Epheſus: where he took ſuch order as he thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampſacus to obedience; that had uſurped their liberty, and obſtinately ſtrove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he ſailed unto the Helleſpont: where having won ſome Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he paſſed over into Europe ſide; and in ſhort ſpace maſtered the Cherſoneſus. Thence went he to Lyſimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deſtroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garriſon thence, to employ it in the Roman War. The Ætolians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppreſſed Lyſimachia, by thruſting thereinto a Garriſon. Hereunto Philip made anſwer, that his Garriſon did not oppreſs the Town, but ſave it from the Barbarians: who took and ſackt it, as ſoon as the Macedonians were gone. That this anſwer was good and ſubſtantial, though it were not accepted as ſuch; might appear by the miſerable caſe, in which Antiochus found Lyſimachia at his coming thither. For the Town was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into ſlavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as alſo to redeem thoſe that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were diſperſed in the Countrey thereabout. Likewiſe he was careful to allure thither, by hopeful promiſes, new Inhabitants; and to repleniſh the City with the wonted frequency. Now to the end that men ſhould not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a journey in hand againſt thoſe barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half, to repair the City. Theſe pains he took, partly in regard of the convenient ſituation, and former glory of Lyſimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and eſtabliſh the Dominion in thoſe parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyſimachus, and thereby made his Kingdom of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he ſhall dearly pay: and as after that Victory againſt Lyſimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed ſhortly; ſo ſhall a deadly wound of the Kingdom founded by Seleucus enſue very ſpeedily, after the re-conqueſt of the ſame Countrey, which was the laſt of Seleucus his purchaſes.

§. IV.

The Romans hold friendly correſpondence with Antiochus, during their War with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chaced by his Enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmur againſt the Romans in Greece. The War of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

FOR the Romans, though they were unable to ſmother their deſire of War with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their Friends and by their Enemies: yet was it much againſt their will to keep the rumour on foot, which they meant ſhortly to make good, of this intended War, ſo long as they wanted matter of quarrel; whereof they were furniſhed, by this Enterpriſe of the Kings about Lyſimachia. It was not long, ſince King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their War with Philip, could obtain of them none other help againſt Antioehus, than Embaſſadors to ſpeak for him; becauſe the one of theſe Kings was held no leſs a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards paſs between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus, at the requeſt of their Embaſſadors, withdrew his Invaſion from the Kingdom of Pergamus: alſo very ſhortly after he ſent Embaſſadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilſt as yet they were buſied with Philip; and therefore had reaſon to anſwer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward ſhew. But when the Macedonian War was at an end, and all, or moſt of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correſpondence changed, into terms of worſe, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his Ten Counſellors ſent from Rome, requited (as hath been * ſhewed before) with a commination of War, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as alſo his long-profeſſed amity, and deſire to continue in the ſame. * Ch. 4. §. ult.

Theſe Ten Counſellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpoſe of the Senate: whereof yet it ſeems that he was not ignorant before; ſince, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto Peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themſelves to make progreſs through divers quarters of Greece, for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them ſhould viſit King Antiochus; and the reſt, where occaſion ſerved, uſe diligence to make a Party ſtrong againſt him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindful of the buſineſs: wherein leſt T. Quintius with his Ten Aſſiſtants, ſhould happen to forget any any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was ſent from Rome of purpoſe, to deal with the King about thoſe controverſies, that were between him and Ptolemy. What other private inſtructions Cornelius had; we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embaſſage. For coming to Selymbria: and there underſtanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having been ſent by Titus, were at Lyſimachia, He haſtned thither; whither alſo came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counſellors) from Bargillæ, to be preſent at the Conference. Hegeſianax and Lyſias were alſo there; the ſame, who had lately brought from Titus thoſe peremptory Conditions, which the Embaſſadours preſent ſhall expound unto their Maſter. After a few days Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between Him and theſe Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the buſineſs in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his Errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reaſon to deliver back unto Ptolemy thoſe Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten poſſeſſion. Hereunto he added, and that very earneſtly, That he muſt alſo give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more abſurd, than ſuch folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that War, wherein they had laboured ſo much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that he ſhould not moleſt thoſe Cities that were free: and finally He demanded of him, upon what reaſon he was come over with ſo great an Army into Europe; for that other cauſe of his Journey there was none probable, than a purpoſe to make War upon the Romans. To this the King made anſwer, That he wondered why the Romans ſhould ſo trouble themſelves, with thinking upon the matters of Aſia: wherewith He praied them to let him alone; even as He, without ſuch curioſity, ſuffered them to do in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe: they ſaw well enough what buſineſs had drawn him thither; namely, the War againſt the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lyſimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging, in Thrace and Cherſoneſus. Now concerning his title unto that Country, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conqueſt thereof, by his victory againſt Lyſimachus. Neither was it ſo, that any of the places in controverſie between him and the other Kings, had been ſtill of old belonging to the Macedonians or Ægyptians; but had been ſeized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at ſuch time as his Anceſtors, being Lords of thoſe Countries, were hindred by multiplicity of buſineſs, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to ſtand in fear of him, as if he intended ought againſt them from Lyſimachia; ſince it was his purpoſe to beſtow this City upon one of his Sons, that ſhould reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Aſia; either againſt the free Cities, or againſt the King of Ægypt; ſince it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding unto himſelf, and to joyn ere long with Ptolemy, not only in friendſhip, but in a bond of near affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refute it; would needs hear further, what the Embaſſadors of Smyrna and of Lampſacus, whom he had there with him, could ſay for themſelves. The Embaſſadors of Lampſacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they ſeemed to accuſe the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; foraſmuch as he had not choſen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between Him and them.

Thus the Treaty held ſome few days, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in ſuch ſort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the War by them intended: nor yet having purpoſe to depart well ſatisfied, and thereby to corroborate the preſent peace; were doubtful how to order the matter, in ſuch wiſe as they might neither too rudely, like boiſterous Gallo-Greeks, pretend only the goodneſs of their Swords; nor yet over modeſtly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their juſtice, forbear the occaſion of making themſelves great. The King on the other ſide was weary of theſe tedious gueſts; that would take no anſwer, and yet ſcarce knew what to ſay. At length came news, without any certain author, That Ptolemy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were deſirous to haſten into Ægypt: Antiochus, to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom; and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and ſet the Country in good order. Cornelius was ſent from Rome Embaſſador, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemy: which gave him occaſion to take leave, and prepare for his Ægyptian Voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embaſſadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Ægypt with the firſt. To his Son Seleucus he committed his Army; and left him to overſee the building of Lyſimachia: but all his Sea forces He took along with him, and ſailed unto Epheſus. Thence he ſent Embaſſadors to T. Quintius: whom he requeſted to deal with him in this matter of Peace, after ſuch ſort, as might ſtand with honeſty and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his Voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemy was alive. This made him bear another way from Ægypt: and afterwards a Tempeſt, with a grievous Shipwrack, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have ſafely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he Wintered ſecure, as might appear, of the Roman War.

But the Romans had not ſo done with him. During the Treaty at Lyſimachia, (at leaſtwiſe not long before or after it) one of their Embaſſadours that had been ſent unto the Macedonian, gave him Counſel, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to reſt contented with the Peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to deſire Society with them, whereby they ſhould be bound to have the ſame Friends and Enemies. And this he adviſed him to do quickly before the War brake out with Antiochus; leſt otherwiſe he might ſeem, to have awaited ſome fit occaſion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be ſatisfied with weak excuſes. In like manner ſome of the Greeks were ſollicited; and particularly the Ætolians, That conſtantly and faithfully they ſhould abide in the friendſhip of the People of Rome. It was needleſs to ſay plainly whereto this Entreaty tended: the froward anſwer made by the Ætolians, declares them to have well underſtood the purpoſe. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had been during the War. They that ſo complained were the moſt moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promiſed unto them:

upbraiding with al the Romans, as Men to them beholding; not only for their Victory over Philip; but even for helping them to ſet foot in Greece, which elſe they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle anſwers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to ſend Embaſſadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs; and then ſhould all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended againſt Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the Enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their City this honourable Man, whom they ſo greatly hated. He had of late exerciſed his vertue againſt them in the Civil adminiſtration; and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the ſway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having ſubject unto them, the Lives, Goods, and fame of all the reſt. Neither did they uſe this their power with moderation: but conſpired in ſuch wiſe together, that who ſo offended any one of them, ſhould have them all to be his Enemies; which being once known, He was ſure to be ſoon accuſed and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the City, Hannibal was choſen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though he was ſuperiour unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto ſuch an annual Magiſtrate, as at the years end muſt be accomptable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore ſending for one of the Quæſtors, or Officers of the Treaſury, to come and ſpeak with him: the proud Quæſtor ſet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverſe Faction to Hannibal; and Men of his place, were to be choſen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the ſpirit of his future Greatneſs. But he had not to do with ſuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal ſent for him by a Purſivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgment before a publick aſſembly of the People. There he not only ſhewed, what the undutiful ſtubbornes of this Quæſtor had been; but how unſufferable the inſolency of all the Judges at the preſent was: whoſe unbridled power, made them to regard neither Laws nor Magiſtrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which paſſed with the general good liking; That the Judges ſhould be choſen from year to year, and no one Man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been paſſed, before he paſſed over Iberus; it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto neceſſity of reforming another greivance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levy by Taxation laied upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting Money in their publick Treaſury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needful charges. Hannibal conſidering this, began to examin the publick Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treaſury, by ways and means whatſoever; and in what ſort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Commonwealth did not exhauſt the Treaſury: but that wicked Magiſtrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greateſt part of the Monies to their own uſe, were thereby fain to load the People with needleſs burdens. Hereof he made ſuch plain demonſtration, that theſe Robbers of the common Treaſure were compelled to reſtore with ſhame, what they had gotten by Knavery: and ſo the Carthaginians were freed from the neceſſity of making ſuch poor ſhifts; as formerly they had uſed, when they knew not the value of their own Eſtate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: ſo they of the Roman Faction, which had, ſince the making of the Peace until now, little regarded him, began to rage extreamly; as being by him ſtript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themſelves to have been in full poſſeſſion of the vanquiſhed Carthage. Wherefore they ſent Letters to their Friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew ſtrong again, and Hannibal would ſhortly be in Arms. Queſtionleſs, if oppreſſing the City by injuſtice, and robbing the Treaſury, were the only way to hold Carthage in Peace with Rome: theſe Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That having done their beſt already to keep all in quiet, they ſaw none other likelihood than of War. But having none other matter to alledg, than their own inventions: they ſaid, That Hannibal was like unto a wild Beaſt, which would never be tamed: That ſecret Meſſages paſt between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleneſs, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what elſe to like effect they could imagine. Theſe accuſations they directed not unto the Senate: but addreſſing their Letters craftily, every one to the beſt of his own Friends at Rome, and ſuch as were Senators; they wrought ſo well, that neither publick notice of their Conſpiracy was taken at Carthage; nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpoſe. Only P. Scipio is ſaid to have admoniſhed the Fathers, that they ſhould not thus diſhonourably ſubſcribe, and become Seconds to the accuſers of Hannibal: as if they would oppreſs, by ſuborning or countenancing falſe Witneſſes againſt him, the Man, againſt whom in War they had not of long time prevailed, nor uſed their Victory in ſuch baſe manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all ſo great minded as Scipio: they wiſhed for ſome ſuch advantage againſt Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embaſſadors they ſent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus; whoſe very names import ſufficient cauſe of bad affection to Hannibal. Theſe having paſt the Sea, were entertained by thoſe that had procured their comings; and, being by them inſtructed how to carry themſelves, gave out, That they were ſent to end ſome Controverſies, between the Carthaginians and Maſaniſſa. But Hannibal had kept ſuch good eſpial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: againſt which he was never unprepared. It were enough to ſay, That he eſcaped them by flight: but in the actions of ſo famous a Man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearſe the particulars. Having openly ſhewed himſelf, as was his manner, in the place of Aſſembly, He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though ſuch as he might well truſt. He had appointed Horſes to be in a readineſs at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea ſide. There had he a Ship furniſhed with all things needful; as having long expected the neceſſity of ſome ſuch Journey. So He bad Africk farewel; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his own. Paſſing over to the Iſle of Cercina; he found there in the Haven ſome Merchants Ships of Carthage. They ſaluted him reſpectively: and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He ſaid, He went Embaſſador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iſland to make a ſacrifice; whereto He invited all the Merchants, and Maſters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore He would needs hold his Feaſt upon the Shore; where, becauſe there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their Sales and Yards to be uſed inſtead of Tents. They did ſo; and Feaſted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there aſleep; and putting to Sea, held on his courſe to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was ſure not to be purſued. For the Merchants did neither make haſte to ſend any news of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embaſſador: neither could they, without ſome loſs of time, ſuch of them as made moſt ſpeed homeward, get away from Cercina; being buſied awhile in fitting their Tackle. At Carthage, the miſs of ſo great a Perſon was diverſly conſtrued. Some gueſſed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been ſeen: and then the Roman Embaſſadors, having none other Errand thither, accuſed him (with an evil grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only diſcovered the miſchief by them intended againſt him, and the malice of their Senate; miſſing the while their purpoſe, and cauſing Men to underſtand, that He fled not thus without great reaſon.

Hannibal, coming to Tyre the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whoſe great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reaſon of affinity between their Cities, thought themſelves to have intereſt. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, viſited his Son in Daphne: who friendly welcomed him, and ſent him unto his Father at Epheſus, that exceedingly rejoyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cauſe to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: ſo had the Romans no great cauſe to be therefore ſorry; otherwiſe than as they had much diſgraced themſelves, by diſcovery of their impotent malice, in chacing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove alike eaſie unto this great Commander, to make ſtout Souldiers of baſe Aſiatiques; as it had been by his training and diſcipline, to make very ſerviceable and skilful Men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardy though unexperienced. Or were it ſuppoſed, that one Mans worth, eſpecially being ſo extraordinary, could alter the nature of a Cowardly People: yet was it therewithal conſiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baſeneſs of his Flatterers, and a thouſand other ſuch vexations, would be far more powerful in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a deſolate and baniſhed Man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in thoſe actions wherein he had the high Command, and was ſeconded by his Warlike Brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further ſerved to hearten Antiochus, and make him leſs careful to avoid the War; then ſhould it further ſerve, to juſtifie the Romans in their quarrel. And it ſeems indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making War. For Antiochus, as is ſaid before, having newly ſent Embaſſadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that He had any meaning to take Arms, unleſs by meer violence he were thereto enforced. Only the Ætolians were greatly ſuſpected, as a turbulent People, deſirous of innovation, and therefore practiſing with this Great King, whom they wiſhed to ſee among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeaſe them; they had of late been anſwered with gentle words by one of the ten Counſellors, That the Senate would grant them whatſoever with reaſon they ſhould ask. But this promiſe was too large, and unadviſed. For when their Embaſſadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them leaſt. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themſelves: otherwiſe than by ſpeaking ſuch words, as might haſten the Romans out of Greece for very ſhame; who had no deſire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome was of War with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to upbraid the reſt of the Greeks, with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed: ſaying, That theſe their Deliverers had laid heavier Fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer, than thoſe of the Macedonian: likewiſe, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the Legs of the Greeks their Chain, and tie it about their Necks. There was indeed no cauſe of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accompliſhment of that which was laid upon him: all the Towns of Greece were at liberty; and the whole Country at Peace, both with the Romans, and within it ſelf. As for Antiochus: He made it his daily ſuit, That the Peace between him and Rome, ſuch as it was, might be confirmed, and ſtrengthned by a League of more aſſurance. Nevertheleſs T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to ſeize upon Greece, as ſoon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained ſtill in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Towns, he might the better withſtand the dangerous Invaſion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embaſſadors, that had been ſent over to aſſiſt him; when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they ſaid, would queſtionleſs fall upon Greece: wherein he ſhould find not only the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do ſomewhat againſt theſe their ſuſpected Enemies: eſpecially againſt Nabis, who could worſt make reſiſtance; whilſt Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intentive to his buſineſs. Theſe reports went not only current through the City, among the vulgar: but found ſuch credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, againſt which time it was expected that Antiochus ſhould be ready to take his great enterpriſe in hand; P. Cornelius, Scipio the African deſired, and obtained, a ſecond Conſulſhip, with intention to be General in the War, againſt the King and his Hannibal. For the preſent, the buſineſs with Nabis was referred unto Titus; to deal him with as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof alſo he knew that many of the Greeks would not be ſorry, though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendſhip with him, two or three years before this, as is already ſhewed, whilſt he had War with Philip: and had further further been contented for the Romans ſake to be at Peace with the Achæans, neither ſince that time had he done any thing, whereby he ſhould draw upon himſelf this War. He was indeed a deteſtable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that beſides his own wicked Conditions had formerly done to them great miſchief. Titus therefore had a plauſible Theme, whereon to diſcourſe before the Embaſſages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he cauſed to meet for that purpoſe at Corinth. He told them, That in the War with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themſelves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearſed) that ſhould ſtir them up, and cauſe them to be earneſt. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other intereſt, than only the making perfect of their honour, in ſetting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in ſome ſort maimed, or incompleat, whilſt the noble City of Argos was left in ſubjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to conſider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether otherwiſe to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themſelves. The Athenian Embaſſador made anſwer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleaſing as he could deviſe. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was paſt; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Propoſition: wherein unrequeſted they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement requeſt of their poor Aſſociates, they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this He added, That great pitty it was to hear, ſuch notable vertue and high deſerts ill ſpoken of by ſome, which took upon them, out of their own imaginations to foretel, what harm theſe their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as Thankfulneſs rather would have required an acknowledgment, of the benefits and pleaſures already received. Every one found the meaning of this laſt clauſe; which was directly againſt the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian roſe up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their ancient glory, in thoſe times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty general: from which honour they were now ſo far fallen, that they became Paraſites unto thoſe whom they thought moſt mighty; and by their baſe aſſentation, would lead all the reſt into ſervitude. Then ſpeak He againſt the Achæans, Clients that had been a long time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adverſity. Theſe He ſaid had gotten Corinth; and muſt now have War be made for their ſakes, to the end that they might alſo be Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had firſt made War with Philip, and always been friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of ſome places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himſelf, but objected unto the Romans fraudulent dealing: foraſmuch as they kept their Garriſons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; having been always wont to profeſs, That Greece could never be at liberty, whilſt thoſe places were not free. Alſo now at laſt, what elſe did they ſeek by this diſcourſe of War with Nabis, than buſineſs wherewith to find themſelves occupied, that ſo they might have ſome ſeeming cauſe of abiding longer in the Country? But they ſhould do well, if they meant as they ſpake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Ætolians themſelves did promiſe, and would undertake, That they would either cauſe him to yield to reaſon, and relinquiſh Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garriſon; or elſe compel him by force of Arms, to ſubmit himſelf to the good pleaſure of all Greece, that was now at unity. Theſe words had been reaſonable, if they had proceeded from better Men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought ſo much with theſe Ætolians; as did their own ravenous deſire of oppreſſing others, and getting unto themſelves, that worſe would uſe it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had loſt. Neither could they well diſſemble this; making it no ſmall part of their greivance, That the old League was forgotten; wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans ſhould enjoy the ſpoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in poſſeſſion of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thouſand miſchiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Aſſembly, eſpecially the Achæans, cry out upon them; entreating the Romans to take ſuch order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Ætolian Thieves be enforced to keep home, and leave their Neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleaſure of Titus: who ſaw, that by diſcountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the reſt. But whether it pleaſed him ſo well, that Antiochus his Embaſſadors did preſently after lie hard upon him, to draw the Peace to ſome good concluſion; it may be greatly doubted. He caſt them off with a ſlight anſwer: telling them, That the ten Embaſſadors or Counſellors which had been ſent unto him from Rome to be his aſſiſtants in theſe matters of weight, were now returned home: and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian War; it was very ſoon ended. For Titus uſed the help of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation againſt Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he ſhould have had to do with Philip. Beſides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Navy, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the ſervice: as alſo Philip of Macedon ſent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in ſeeking revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the moſt forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who ſet out ten thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe. As for the Ætolians, rather to hold good faſhion, and ſound their diſpoſitions, than in hope to ſpeed, their help was required; whereof they excuſed themſelves as well as they thought beſt. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ætolians from that degree of favour: like as they themſelves hereafter (though not in all haſte) ſhall be ſupplanted by the ſame Lacedæmonians, againſt whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives more bold than wiſe, began a conſpiracy againſt the Lacedæmonians that held their Town; meaning to open their Gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and ſlain: excepting a very few, that eſcaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, cauſed the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no ſtir within the Walls:

the execution done upon the firſt movers, having terrified all the reſt of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to aſſail Nabis in the head of his ſtrength at Lacedæmon, than to conſume time about other places; eſpecially at Argos: for the freedom whereof ſince the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the War ſhould thereon fall moſt heavily.

Nabis had in readineſs an Army of fifteen thouſand, wherewith to defend himſelf againſt theſe Invaders. Five thouſand of them were Mercinaries: the reſt, of his own Country, but ſuch as were of all others the worſt, as manumiſed Slaves, Malefactors, and baſe Peaſants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficial. Of the good and worthy Citizens he ſtood in doubt: and ſince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an Aſſembly: and compaſſing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themſelves; they might, he ſaid, hope the better to withſtand the common Enemy. But foraſmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occaſions, to raiſe tumults, and work dangerous Treaſon: it ſeemed unto him the ſafeſt, and (withal) the mildeſt courſe, to arreſt before hand and put in ward, all thoſe whom he found moſt reaſon to ſuſpect. So ſhould he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preſerve not only the City and his own Perſon from danger, but them alſo from the puniſhment, which elſe they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourſcore of them; whom he leads away to Priſon, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he ſure that they neither ſhould offend, nor yet break looſe. As for the death of them, if it ſhould happen to be noiſed abroad: what could it elſe do than terrifie the People; who muſt thereby underſtand, that it was a mortal Crime to be ſuſpected? and to the ſame purpoſe, his cruelty extended it ſelf unto ſome poor wretches: whom he accuſed of a meaning to fly to the Enemy. Theſe were openly whipt through all the Streets, and ſlain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens; He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a ſally: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at firſt; but were at length repelled with loſs. Titus abode not many days before Sparta: but over-ran the Country; hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to Battel. The Roman Fleet at the ſame time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid Siege unto Gyttheum, the only or principal Haven-town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force; when there appeared hope of getting it by Treaſon. There were two Governours within the Town, equal in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or deſire of reward, had a purpoſe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being ſomewhat more faithful, ſlue the Traitor; after whoſe death, he himſelf alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Army came thither to Gyttheum: this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermoſt, and await what either Time or his Maſter might do for him, but was contented to give up the place; yet upon Condition, to depart in ſafety to Sparta with his Garriſon. Pythagoras, the Son-in-law of Nabis, and Brother unto his Wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government with a thouſand Souldiers Mercinaries, and two thouſand Argives: it being (as may ſeem) the Tyrants purpoſe, to relieve Gyttheum: which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was loſt: then began they to think upon finiſhing the War, by ſome reaſonable Compoſition. Pythagoras therefore was ſent Embaſſador to Titus: requeſting only, that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and ſpeak with him. This was granted. In that Parley the Tyrant ſpeak very reaſonably for himſelf: proving, that he ſuffered wrong and had done none; and that by many good arguments; whereof the ſum was, That whatſoever they now did, or could, object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred. That neither for his keeping the Town of Argos, nor for any other cauſe by them alledged, they ought to make War upon him; ſince Argos, and all other their allegations whatſoever, had not hindred them, in time of their more need of him, from entring into that League with him; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith ſatisfied. He charged him with Tyranny; and gave inſtance, as eaſily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, foraſmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him; it was expedient, that ſome other cauſe of this Invaſion ſhould be alledged. Wherefore he ſaid further, That this Tyrant had occupied Meſſene, a Town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyn with Philip, when he was their Enemy, not only in League, but alſo in affinity: and That his Fleet had robbed many of their Ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, ſince in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis there was no reſtitution mentioned, other than of Ships by him taken from the Greeks his Neighbours, with whom he had long held War: it may ſeem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the Volume of thoſe complaints, that were otherwiſe very frivolous. As for Meſſene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweeen the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it ſeems that Ariſtænus, the Prætor of the Achæans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting leſt the Romans, (that were wont to talk ſo much of their own juſtice, honour, and faithful dealing) ſhould now relent, and forbear to moleſt him, who, though a wicked Man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong; framed his diſcourſe to an other end. He entreated Nabis to conſider well of his own eſtate; and to ſettle his fortunes, whilſt he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to ſurrender their Eſtates, and lived in great ſecurity, honour, and happineſs, as private Men. Thus they diſcourſed until night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquiſh Argos; and requeſted them, to deliver unto him in writing their other demands, that he might take Counſel with his friends. The iſſue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates muſt be, for maintenance of an Army to lye in League all that Winter (as there was no hope of making ſhort work) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make Peace with the Tyrant, upon ſuch Conditions as Titus ſhould think meet. Beſides the reſtitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending;

Titus

Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and ſome of them very grievous. He would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonian to have ought to do in the Iſle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor War, either in that Iſland, or elſewhere; not to build any Town or Caſtle upon his own Lands; not to keep any other ſhipping, than two ſmall Barks; beſides many other troubleſome injunctions; with impoſition of an hundred Talents in Silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty Talents yearly, for Eight years next enſuing. For obſervance of theſe Covenants he demanded Five Hoſtages, ſuch as he himſelf ſhould name; and one of them to be the Tyrants own Son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the War from Nabis, becauſe it was not grounded upon juſtice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himſelf did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reaſonable, to diſpence a little with the Roman Faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the ſtate of their beſt friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then ſhould this Enterpriſe, when once it was taken in hand, have been proſecuted unto the very utmoſt. As for this middle courſe which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themſelves by the Spoil of one that had not offended them: nor pleaſing to the Achæans, who judged it ever after a great blemiſh to the noble acts of Titus: ſo did it miniſter unto the Ætolians, and to ſuch as curiouſly pried into the faults of thoſe which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious diſcourſe. For ſince Philip, a King, and deſcended of many famous Kings, might not be ſuffered by theſe Maſterly Romans, to hold any one of thoſe Countries, or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Anceſtors: it was thought very ſtrange, that Lacedæmon, once the moſt famous City among all the Greeks, was by the ſame Romans left in poſſeſſion of a Tyrant, that had uſurped it but yeſterday: and he therein rooted by their authority, as their Friend and Confederate. Nabis, on the other ſide, thought himſelf unmercifully dealt withal, by the ſelf-ſame Romans; whoſe amity he had preferred in time of a doubtful War, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But falſly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falſly was he dealt with by thoſe to whom he did betake himſelf. Among theſe Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleaſed him; ſave only that for the baniſhed Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Ageſipolis, the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child, was driven out by Lycurgus, the firſt of the Tyrants) there was made no proviſion, to have them reſtored unto their City and Eſtates; but only leave required for as many of their Wives, as would be ſo contented, to live abroad with them in baniſhment. Wherefore he forbore to give conſent unto theſe demands: and ſuſtained an aſſault or two, hoping belike, that the Enemies would ſoon be weary. But his fearful nature ſhortly overcame the reſolution, which the ſenſe of theſe injuries had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, he delivered the Hoſtages; and thereupon obtained Peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome, by the Senate and People. From this time forward, he thought the Romans more wicked than himſelf; and was ready upon the firſt advantage, to do them all Miſchief that he could.

The Argives had heard news, that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to ſet upon the Garriſon; which was much weakned, by the remove of the three thouſand carried thence by Pythagoras, to help the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them joyntly ſhould ſet their hands to the getting of it; which no ſooner they did than they obtained it. Preſently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deſervedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laid hold, without ſtaying for him: and that he might the better entitle himſelf thereto, he cauſed the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemæan Games; as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Council of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more ſtrengthned, than the Argives themſelves were ſecured from danger of relapſe, into the ſame Extremities out of which they had newly eſcaped.

After this, Titus found little buſineſs, or none, wherewith to ſet on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to ſend another Embaſſage to Rome, deſiring peace and friendſhip of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly diſpoſed unto quiet; Scipio, the African, that was choſen Conſul at Rome, could not have his deſire, of being ſent Commander into Greece. The unſincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous diſpoſition of the Ætolians, were held as conſiderations worthy of regard: yet not ſufficient cauſes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honeſt way of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perſwading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by thoſe that meant to aſſure unto themſelves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey, was their ſole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it ſelf, till occaſion ſhould be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had ſpent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near diſtance appearing; he called an Aſſembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewel. There he recounted unto them all that had paſſed ſince his coming into thoſe parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendſhip, according to the difference of Eſtate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added ſome wholeſome counſel; touching the moderate uſe of their liberty, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Laſtly, he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Achæans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garriſon, and promiſing to do the like (which very ſoon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that ſo it might be known, what liars the Ætolians were, who had accuſed the Romans, of a purpoſe to retain thoſe places. With joyful acclamations did the Greeks teſtifie their good liking of that which Titus had ſaid and done: as alſo (at his requeſt) they agreed, to ranſom and enlarge all Romans, that had been ſold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his vertue and benefits, untainted by jealouſie and ſuſpicion of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, he had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodlieſt of all that Rome had until that day beheld. Three days together the ſhew of his pomp continued: as being ſet out with the Spoils of a Countrey, more aboundant in things worthy of ſuch a Spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All ſorts of Arms, with Statues, and curious pieces of Braſs or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the firſt days Pageant. The ſecond day, was brought in, all the Treaſure of Gold and Silver: ſome in the rude Maſs unwrought; ſome, in divers ſorts of Coin; and ſome, in Veſſels of ſundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the Workmanſhip. Among theſe were Ten Shields, all of Silver, and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himſelf entred the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, beſtowed upon him by divers Cities. There were alſo led the Beaſts for Sacrifice, the Priſoners, and the Hoſtages: among which, Demetrius, the Son of King Philip, and Armenes, the Son of Nabis, were principal. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from ſlavery in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph, he procured audience of the Senate for many Embaſſages, that were come out of Greece and Aſia. They had all very favourable anſwers, excepting thoſe of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintius, and the Ten that had been his Counſellors; becauſe their buſineſs was ſaid to be ſomewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embaſſadors wondred. They ſaid unto Titus, and his Aſſociates, That they could not diſcern wherein conſiſted any perplexity of their meſſage. For all Treaties of peace and friendſhip, were either between the Victor, and the vanquiſhed; between thoſe, that having warred together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between thoſe, that had lived always in good agreement, without any quarrel. Unto the Victor, they ſaid, that the vanquiſhed muſt yield; and patiently endure the impoſition of ſome Covenants, that elſe might ſeem unreaſonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it uſual to demand and make reſtitution, of things and places claimed, gotten, or loſt; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between thoſe which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of eſtabliſhing friendſhip to be propoſed: ſince it was reaſonable, that each part ſhould hold their own; and neither carry it ſelf as ſuperior unto the other, in preſcribing ought that might be troubleſome. Now of this laſt kind, was the League and Friendſhip that had been ſo long in concluſion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being ſo; they held it ſtrange, that the Romans ſhould thus inſiſt on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to preſcribe unto the King, what Cities of Aſia he ſhould ſet at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting, or not putting, his Garriſons into them, as the Senate ſhould think fit. Hereto Quintius anſwered, That ſince they went ſo diſtinctly to work, he would alſo do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to accept: Either that it ſhould be lawful for the Romans, to take part in Aſia with any that would ſeek their friendſhip; Or, if King Antiochus miſliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Aſia, that then he ſhould abandon whatſoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing; but no reaſonable nor pertinent anſwer, to that which the Kings Embaſſadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abſtain from Aſia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampſacus, or any other Aſiatiques, whom they were pleaſed to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make War with a King that ſought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great ſhame be ſo baſe, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lyſimachia, whereon of late he had been at ſo much coſt; in building it up even from the foundations, and re-peopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been diſperſed, or captive to the Barbarians. And ſo much the Embaſſadors with great indignation alledged: ſaying, that Antiochus deſired friendſhip of the Romans; but ſo, as it might ſtand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans took upon them, as if their cauſe were far the ſuperior. For it was, they ſaid, their purpoſe to ſet at liberty thoſe Towns, which the King would oppreſs, and hold in ſubjection: eſpecially ſince thoſe Towns were of Greekiſh Blood and Language; and fell in that regard under the patronage, which Rome had afforded unto all Greece beſides. By this colour they might ſoon have left Antiochus King of not many Subjects on the hither ſide of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to ſay, That unleſs he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning, not only to protect thoſe which relied upon them in Aſia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be underſtood) with ſuch as were his Subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embaſſadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of theſe two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleaſing anſwer, which the Embaſſadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving preſently defiance to the King. But they ſuffered themſelves to be entreated, and were contented once again to ſend over P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lyſimachia; by whom they might receive a final anſwer, whether theſe demands made by Quintius, and his aſſociates, would be accepted, yea, or no. By this reſpite of time, and the fruitleſs Treaties enſuing, Antiochus got the leiſure of two years, or thereabouts, to prepare for War, finding in the Romans, all that while, no diſpoſition to let him live in peace.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Maſaniſſa to the Carthaginians: that ſue to the Romans for juſtice in vain.

THE Inſubrians, Boiians, and other of the Ciſalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continual War upon the Romans in Italy, even from ſuch time as Hannibal, and his brother Mago, departed thence, until ſuch time as they themſelves were utterly ſubdued: which was not, before the Romans were almoſt at the height of their Empire. Theſe Nations having ſerved under Mago, for Wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar, a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath been already ſhewed; by this their fellowſhip in Arms, grew to be ſuch willing partakers each of others fortune, that ſeldom afterwards either the Gaules or Liguri-ans did ſtir alone, but that their Companions, hear-hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardy; it hath been long since rehearsed, between the first and second Punick Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrey, by means of Hannibal his passage therethrough. Neither is it likely, that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this War had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that always made them to proceed warily, having an Eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying Ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Countrey was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken nor besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment, unto a victorious Army that should spoil their Land. In these respects they served excellently well, to train up the Roman Souldiers to hardness, and military patience: teaching them (besides other Exercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borders, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the War which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custom, rather than by judgment: and to acknowledg no such vertue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they return to mind. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them, and any of their neighbours, use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custom for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Ch. 2. §. 8. of this Book.

Divers overthrows, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distress; and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Countrey was a good place of Exercise unto the Romans; so out of their own Countrey they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make War, save on their own ground.

The Countrey of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in Figure by some Geographers, unto an Ox-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus, the Indian, shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Emblem of his large Dominions. For, treading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldom did it happen, that those parts, from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not up in Rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred up to Arms; but had not much knowledg in the Art of War, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Countrey; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had united themselves together, for chacing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrows; as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking Arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make evacuation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercinaries in their Wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and used them in an other: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Countrey; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and withal too great, for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should always maintain such Armies in the Countrey, as might serve to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedful Captains, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrey, though seldom in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same general ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the Forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many Victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Countrey; which lasted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War; yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a Battel with the Roman Proconsul, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to send thither Two Prætors, and with each of them some Two Legions. These did somewhat; yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the year following, and sent into that Province; found at his coming little less to do, than the re-conquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one mind: some were faithful to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the pains that that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chief of them; they roſe againſt him in many parts of the Country, and put him to much new trouble. Whilſt he was about to make a journey againſt thoſe that were as yet unſubdued: ſome of the lately vanquiſhed, were even ready to rebel. He therefore diſarmed them: which they took ſo heavily, that many of them ſlew themſelves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well underſtanding, that ſuch deſparation might work dangerous effects; He called unto him the principal among them: and commending unto them peace and quietneſs, which they never had diſturbed but unto their own great loſs, He prayed them to deviſe what courſe might be taken, for holding them aſſured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counſel in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject, He gave expreſs charge, That upon a day appointed they ſhould throw down the Walls of all their Towns. Afterwards he carried the War about from place to place; and with ſingular induſtry finiſhed it in ſhort time. Neither thought he it any diſgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, againſt other of their Countrymen: excuſing the indignity, ſuch as it ſeemed, with a jeſt, That if he were vanquiſhed and ſlain, then ſhould he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, he could pay them with the Enemies Money. Finally he brought the War to ſo good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troubleſome, yet was it in no danger of being loſt. He increaſed alſo the publick Revenues in that Province, by cauſing ſome Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a Vertue much agreeable to his own peculiar diſpoſition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed, The Occupation of the Romans; but ſo well furniſhed with all other uſeful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might ſeem requiſite to the accompliſhment of a perfect man. He was very skilful in the Roman Laws, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any buſineſs either private or publick. Many Books he wrote: whereof the Principal were, of the Roman Antiquities, and of Husbandry. In matter of Husbandry he was notable, and thereby moſt increaſed his ſubſtance; being of mean birth, and the firſt of his Houſe. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: ſo as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which moſt commended him unto the better ſort of the Romans, was his great ſincerity of life, abſtinence from Bribes, and faſhioning himſelf to the ancient laudable Cuſtoms of the City. Herein he had merited ſingular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not cauſed him to malign the Vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and ſome other Worthy Men; that were no leſs honeſt than himſelf, though far leſs rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwiſe he was a very good Citizen, and one of ſuch temper, that he could faſhion himſelf to all occaſions, as if he never were out of his Element. He loved buſineſs ſo well, or rather hated vice ſo earneſtly; that even unto the end of his life, he was exerciſed in defending himſelf, or accuſing others. For at the age of fourſcore and ſix years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accuſed Sergius Galba unto the People. So began the Nobility of Cato his Family; which ended in his great Grandchild M. Cato the Utican: one, that being of like Vertue and Fervency, had all his good purpoſes daſht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of ſuch Nobility and greatneſs as this his Anceſtor had continually vexed.

The Spaniſh Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Country ſeldom free from inſurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two every year were ſent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into two Governments) did rarely fail of ſuch work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One ſlew thirteen thouſand Spaniards in a Battel: another took fifty Towns; and a third enforced many States of the Country to ſue for Peace. Thus every one of them, or moſt of them, did ſome laudable ſervice; yet ſo, that commonly there were of Men, Towns and People, new that rebelled, in ſtead of the old that were ſlain, taken or reclaimed. At the cauſes hereof I have already pointed: and therefore think it enough to ſay, That the buſineſs in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Conſul, from ſuch time as Cato thence departed, until the Numantian War brake out; which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the Weſt of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had Peace: but ſo had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the Enemies of the Barchine Houſe promiſed all Felicity which Rome could grant, unto themſelves and their obedient City: Maſaniſſa fell to diſputing with the Sword, about the title to to the beſt part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the leſſer Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged; and by winning ſome part of it, ſeemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Maſters the Romans. They had none other way of redreſs, then by ſending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And ſurely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had been unpartial. For beſides that Scipio, in limiting out unto them their bounds, had left them the poſſeſſion of this Country: Maſaniſſa himſelf, now very lately, purſuing a Rebel that fled out of his Kingdom, deſired leave of the Carthaginians, for himſelf to paſs through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwiſe been queſtionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithanding, Maſaniſſa had wherewith to juſtifie his proceedings, eſpecially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to underſtand by his Embaſſadors, what faithleſs people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been ſent unto them from Hannibal one, that ſhould perſwade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined, upon ſome ſuſpicion of his Errand; yet neither arreſting him nor his Ship, had thereby afforded him means to eſcape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpoſe to rebel; and therefore good policy to keep them down. As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had always he ſaid, been theirs, that were able to hold it by ſtrong hand: and ſo belonged ſometimes unto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in poſſeſſion of the Carthaginians. But if truth were known: the Citizens of Carthage had no very warrantable title, unto any more ground, than that whereon there City ſtood; or ſcarcely to ſo much. For they were no better than Strangers in Aſrick, that hed gotten leave there to build upon ſo much ground as they could encompaſs with an Ox-hide cut into ſmall Thongs. Whatſoever they held without ſuch a compaſs, was purchaſed by fraud, and wrongful encroachments. This conſidered, Maſaniſſa requeſted of the Senate, That they would not adjudge unto ſuch Uſurpers, the Countrey ſometimes appertaining to the Anceſtors of him their aſſured Friend. The Romans having heard theſe allegations on both ſides, found the matter ſo doubtful, that they could not on the ſudden tell what to determine. Wherefore becauſe they would do nothing raſhly; they ſent over three Embaſſadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chief to decide the controverſie: yet ſecretly giving them inſtructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaſſadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely that Maſaniſſa with a ſtrong Army ſhould quickly prevail, againſt thoſe that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim againſt the wrong. By ſuch Arts were the Carthaginians held not only from ſtirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any diſpoſition; but were prepared by little and little unto their final deſtruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leiſure to expreſs the utmoſt of their hatred.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to war upon the Romans; by whom they hold themſelves wronged and diſgraced. Nabis beſieged Gyttheum, and waſteth ſome part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen, in advantage of Ground: whereby he utterly vanquiſheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, joyns with the Ætolians. The Ætolians ſurprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis their Confederate, ſeize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perſwaſions, annext themſelves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at Peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætolians to think, that they who had promiſed unto themſelves the whole Spoil of Philip, and the higheſt reputation among the Greeks; were not only diſappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forſaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the moſt unregarded. Yet was there made a great acceſs to their Eſtate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might have well ſufficed them, if their deſires had not been immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their deſire. But they were not ſo pleaſed with that which they had, ſince they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themſelves to be wholly diſ-eſteemed, wherein they thought that they had unſufferable wrong. Wherefore they deviſed in a Parliament, which they ſhortly held, by what means they might beſt right themſelves; and give the Romans a ſorrowful knowledge of the difference, between their Enmity and Friendſhip. To this purpoſe they ſoon agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not only perſwade Antiochus to make War upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refuſed Peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to join all together in a new Confederacy: whoſe joynt forces could not in all likelihood but far ſurmount thoſe of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterpriſe, which the Ætolians took in hand: and well beſeeming them, for they were great darers. They ſent Embaſſadors to all theſe Kings, with perſwaſions as they thought moſt forcible. But Philip was irreſolute; and Antiochus willing to try firſt all other Courſes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had loſt much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet ſhewed himſelf of all other the moſt forward: and not ſtaying ſo much as to ſeek any good pretence, began immediately to lay ſiege to Gyttheum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whoſe care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affairs of Peloponneſus, were not ſlow to admoniſh Nabis of his Duty: neither would they have ſtayed long from repreſſing his violence by open War; had not ſome of them thought it wiſdom to ask Counſel of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themſelves in a buſineſs of ſuch importance. Whilſt thus they ſpent the time in ſending Embaſſadors, and were adviſed by Quintius to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman Forces that would ſhortly be amongſt them: Nabis was bold to give them juſter cauſe of complaint, by waſting their own Territory.

Philopœmen was then Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been abſent in Crete; making War there for his minds ſake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans referred themſelves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleaſure; either ſtaying until the Romans came; or doing otherwiſe, as he ſhould think beſt. He made all haſte to relieve Gyttheum by Sea; fearing leſt the Town, and the Achæan Garriſon within it, ſhould be loſt, if he uſed any delay. But Philopœmen was ſo bad a Seaman, that he knew not a ſtrong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gally his Admiral, that had fourſcore years ago been counted a gallant Veſſel, in the Navy of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the reſt of his Fleet ſo good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Only it fell out well, that he committed himſelf to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her Wings, than with her Tallons. For his Admiral Gally was ſtemmed at the firſt; and being rotten with age, ſprang ſo many Leaks, and took in Water ſo faſt, that ſhe was fain to yield without further reſiſtance. When the reſt of the Fleet ſaw what was become of their Admiral; all were preſently diſcouraged, and ſaved themſelves with what ſpeed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-ſervice, which was none of his Occupation; He ſaid that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the Siege of Gyttheum, to ſtop the Achæans if they ſhould invade his Countrey. But upon theſe which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came unexpected; fired their Camp; and put all ſave a very few of them to the ſword. Then marched he with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him; that had already taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nabis would have been ready for them ſo ſoon. Or if he ſhould come from Gyttheum, with any any part of his Forces: yet was it thought that he muſt overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almoſt ſecurely, in a long Troop reaching ſome five miles: having their Horſe and the greateſt part of their Auxiliaries at their backs to bear off any ſudden impreſſion. But Nabis, who formerly underſtood, or at leaſt ſuſpected, what courſe they would take: appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the cuſtom of Philopœmen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his Friends, to mark the ſituation of the Countrey about him; and to diſcourſe, what might befal an Army marching the ſame way. He would ſuppoſe, That having with them there ſuch a number of Souldiers, ordered and ſorted in ſuch manner, and marching towards ſuch a place; he were upon that ground encountred by a greater Army, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the queſtion, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a ſtand? what piece of ground it were meet for him to ſeize upon; and in what manner he might beſt do it? in what ſort he ſhould order his Men? where beſtow his Carriages; and under what Guard? in what ſort encamp himſelf? and which way march the day following? By ſuch continual meditation, he was grown ſo perfect, that he never met with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himſelf and his followers. At this time he made a ſtand: and having drawn up his Rere, he encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His Baggage, with all thereto belonging, he beſtowed on a Rock; encompaſſing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the ways bad, and the day almoſt quite ſpent; ſo as Nabis could not at the preſent greatly moleſt him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to miniſter the firſt occaſion of skirmiſh. Philopœmen underſtood this; and laid an Ambuſh in place convenient; whereinto the Mercinaries of Nabis fell, and were ſlaughtered in great numbers. Preſently after this, he cauſed one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant, as a Fugitive, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpoſe to get between him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withal encourage the People, to take Arms for the recovery of their Freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched haſtily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwiſe would have been forced. Some Companies he made to ſtay behind, and ſhew themſelves upon the Rampart, whereby to conceal his departure. But Philopœmen was not ſo to be beguiled. He eaſily won the Camp; and gave chace to Nabis: whoſe followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about and make head. The Enemies being thus diſperſed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in covert all that day; Philopœmen conceived aright, that their fear and neceſſity would teach them to creep homewards, and ſave themſelves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Evening, when he had gathered together all thoſe of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whilſt it was day; He led forth the reſt that had well refreſhed themſelves, and occupied the two moſt ordinary paſſages unto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his Men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopœmens Camp great ſtore of lights, thought that all had been at reſt: and therefore adventured to make an eſcape home. But they were ſo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty days together after this, did Philopœmen waſte the Countrey round about; whilſt Nabis durſt not iſſue forth of his Town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without Forces.

The Roman Embaſſadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their Party ſtrong againſt Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be ſollicited by the Ætolians. Very fair countenance they alſo made unto Philip; and with comfortable promiſes drew him to make ſhew, whatſoever he thought, of good Correſpondence. They promiſed to reſtore unto him his Son: and were contented to let him hope, that he ſhould receive other favours at their hands; and regain poſſeſſion of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for War againſt Antiochus in Greece: whilſt their Embaſſadors that were with him in Aſia, denied otherwiſe to grant him Peace, than if he would yield unto one of the Conditions, by them ſo often propounded. The long abſence of this King in Syria, where he had accompliſhed the marriage between Ptolemy and his Daughter: together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings Son, which happened during the Treaty, and hindred, or ſeemed to hinder the King, from giving audience in Perſon to the Embaſſadors; cauſed them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their anſwer as at their ſetting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficial unto them, they brought to paſs during their abode at Epheſus; either by cunning or (as Livy rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they diſcourſed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus, upon a cauſeleſs ſuſpicion wherein he held the Romans: that honoured his Vertue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of theſe Embaſſadors; and that he, among other diſcourſes with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged the moſt worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the firſt place: to Pyrrhus the ſecond: and the third he challenged unto himſelf. But Scipio who thought his own Title better, than that it ought to be ſo forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldeſt thou have ſaid then, Hannibal, if thou hadſt vanquiſhed me? to whom the Carthaginian replyed, Then would not I have given the firſt place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my ſelf. Now whether this were ſo or otherwiſe: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embaſſadors, made him ſuſpected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbear a while to uſe his Counſel. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainly deſiring him to tell the cauſe thereof, heard what it was; He eaſily recovered his former Grace and Credit. For he told how his Father had cauſed him to ſwear at the Altars, when he was a little Boy, That he never ſhould be Friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain ſurmiſes: but to know thus much, That as long as he thought upon War with Rome, ſo long would Hannibal do him all good ſervice: whereas contrariwiſe if he intended to make Peace, then ſhould it behove him to uſe the Counſel of ſome other Man.

The Ætolians, and their Friends, were no leſs buſie all this while, in making their Party ſtrong againſt the Romans: than were the Romans, in muſtring up their Friends in Greece. They had ſo often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their own Forces, and arrogating to themſelves the honour of the Victory againſt Philip; that finally they prevailed with him: eſpecially when the Roman Embaſſadors had left him without hope of Peace, unleſs he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like ſort with the Macedonian. But in vain. He underſtood the Romans, and himſelf, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own Forces to the utmoſt: as knowing, that all the Burthen muſt lie upon Antiochus and themſelves, without help from any; ſave only from ſome few that were diſcontented in Greece. Whilſt they were about this, and had with them an Embaſſador of the King Antiochus that animated them to reſolution: the Athenian Embaſſadors, whom Titus had requeſted to be at their meeting, ſtayed their vehemency a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude raſhly, without firſt hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready anſwer hereto they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the buſineſs worthy of his Preſence. For ſince Antiochus had now declared himſelf againſt the Romans: it would be no ſmall piece of ſervice, to withdraw from his Friendſhip, thoſe by whoſe encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or Great Aſſembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ſerve to appeaſe them. He willed them to conſider the weight of the Enterpriſe which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign-field, on which, to the ruin of the Countrey, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no ſmall part of the World, ſhould fight for the Maſtery: the Ætolians, as Maſters in that kind of Fence, ſetting them on, and becoming * the Sticklers. As for thoſe grievances which did thus exaſperate them and urge them to ſuch violent courſes, He willed them to conſider how ſlight they were, and how much better they might do to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, that ſhould either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make requeſt to have what they deſired: than thus to ſet the World in an uproar, and be afterwards the firſt that ſhould repent it. But what he ſaid or could ſay, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embaſſador of the King, whoſe help they had ſought, wait ſo long for an anſwer, and ſtay doubting what good end they ſhould make with the Romans. Neither was it news unto them to hear thoſe comfortable words, That by ſending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they deſired; either as their right, or elſe by way of favour. For with ſuch Terms had they been feaſted once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who, having it in his own power, gave them no ſatisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This were only loſs of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great ſhould be entreated to come over into Greece, as well to ſet the Countrey at liberty, as alſo to decide the controverſies depending between the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not underſtood the Kings mind before. Having made it; they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themſelves to the Kings Embaſſadors, and againſt the Romans. Titus deſired of their Prætor, to let him ſee a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor anſwered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further anſwer, they would ſhortly ſet him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the River of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as the Ætolians are like to underſtand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the War they referred unto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occaſion might ſlip in waiting for the authority of a general Aſſembly. The Apocleti (ſo were the Privy Council of Ætolia called) went as hotly to work, as any of the youngeſt heads could have done. They laid a Plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they ſent men for the purpoſe. Demetrias they took upon the ſudden: entring, ſome of them as Friends to conduct home a Principal man of the City: who for ſpeaking words againſt T. Quintius, had been driven to fly thence, but was, by interceſſion of thoſe that loved him, again recalled. His Ætolian companions that were not many, ſeized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troop which they had left not far behind them; and ſo fell to murdering the chief of the Roman faction. At Chalcis they ſped not ſo well. Thither alſo they had a baniſhed Man to bring home: but they came ſo ſtrong, that their purpoſe was diſcovered, and the Town prepared to defend it ſelf againſt them. Being therefore demanded the cauſe of this hoſtility, they gave a gentle anſwer: ſaying, That they came not thither as Enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans: who more inſolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By ſuch Rhetorick they prevailed no more than they could do by plain force. For the Townſmen replyed, that they neither found any abridgement of their Liberty, nor needed any Garriſon to keep them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this buſineſs was daſht. The attempt upon Sparta was more ſtrange and deſperate. Nabis their good Friend, was Lord of the Town: ſtyling himſelf King; but more truly, by all men called Tyrant. He had well-near loſt all, by means of the overthrow which Philopæmen had lately given him: ſince, he durſt not ſtir abroad; and daily expected the miſchief, that on all ſides threatned him. Wherefore he ſent Meſſengers, one after other, to the Ætolians: requeſting them, that as he had not been ſlow to ſtir in their behalf, but adventured himſelf upon the utmoſt of danger, when all others were backward; ſo they would be pleaſed to ſend him what help they might, ſince his bad fortune had cauſed him preſently to need it. It hath been often ſaid, that the ravenous Ætolians were only true to themſelves, and regarded neither faith nor friendſhip, otherwiſe then as it might conduce to their own ends. And ſo dealt they now. For ſince Nabis his Mercinary Forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner conſumed: they thought it expedient for their Eſtate, to put him out of the way; and, by ſo doing, to aſſure Lacedæmon unto themſelves. To this purpoſe, they ſent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for ſuch a work. To him they gave a thouſand Foot, and thirty Horſe, choſen for the purpoſe. Theſe thirty were by Damocritus the Prætor brought into the Council of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiſer than they ſhould be, nor to think that they were ſent to make War with the Achæans, or to do ought elſe, ſave only what Alexamenus, ſhould command them: which were it never ſo deſperate, and in ſeeming againſt all reaſon; yet muſt they underſtand, that unleſs they performed it, they ſhould have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words: telling him, that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to find other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætolians, He said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a Muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater Company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his Men, that had been long pent up in the City, and train them without the Walls: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his Men in the field; riding up and down with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or four Horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Ætolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work that he had in hand: He then went aside to his thirty Horse-men, and bad them remember the task enjoyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished Men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithal the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirty Ætolians never stood to deliberate upon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercinaries ran unto the dead Body: where instead of seeking revenge they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians hasted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens. who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Town was shortly in Arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royal stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his Children; whom they mounted upon a Good Horse, and made him their chief. So they fell upon the Ætolians that were idely straggling about; and put them all to the Sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Company, were slain in keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as Bond-slaves. In this doubtful Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopœmen came thither: who calling out chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexamenus should have done after he had slain the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprise, no less dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians, and the small but effectual, travel of Philopœmen; the Achæans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto been governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof the name had scarce any reputation when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors, and the Ætolians, with the Civil answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired Peace, between the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good Counsel in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King retires to Chalcis; Where he marrieth a young Wife, and revels away the rest of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

ANtiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous with all speed convenient to shew himself in Greece; where he had been told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in Arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a Chain, desiring nothing more than to break loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to confer upon him the greatness, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilst therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care aside: for that his Countrimen had already taken Demetrias; a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatness of his vertue and fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit Man to be employed in the Kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly greatly feell the loſs of a Fleet or Army, periſhing under ſuch a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the ſame had miſcarried under one of meaner quality: whereas nevertheleſs if Hannibal prevailed; Hannibal alone ſhould have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That ſuch a renowned Warriour ſhould be always near unto the Kings Perſon, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good ſucceſs would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the Sovereign Command; even of the King himſelf. Antiochus gladly hearkned unto this admonition; being jealous of the vertue, that ſhined brighter than the Majeſty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aſide the determination; which tended more to the advancement of his deſires, than did any thing elſe by him then or after thought upon.

Preſently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his ſetting forth, in a frivolous pomp of Ceremony, he went up from the Sea-ſide to Ilium; there to do ſacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence paſſing over the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the ſame whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wan Demetrias; was now the chief Man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countrimen, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and took it as a ſign of good luck, to be ſo entertained at the beginning. But it may be ſuſpected, that the Magnetians found not the like cauſe of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army ſomewhat like to that of Xerxes: they ſaw three hundred Ships, of which no more than forty were ſerviceable for the Wars; with an Army of ten thouſand Foot, five hundred Horſe, and ſix Elephants. The Ætolians no ſooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Country. He knew before that they would ſo do; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyful entertainment as they could deviſe. Being brought into their Council, He made an Oration: wherein he deſired them to hold him excuſed, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he ſaid, in true eſtimation a ſign of his good will: in that he ſtaid not to make all things ready; but haſted unto their aid, even whilſt the ſeaſon was unfit for navigation. Yet it ſhould not be long, ere the hope of all thoſe which had expected him, would be ſatisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coaſt with his Fleets. Neither would he ſpare for any charge, travel, or danger, to follow the buſineſs which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authority out of Greece; leaving the Country free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, ſhould be very great: ſo was it his meaning, that all proviſions to them belonging ſhould be correſpondent; becauſe he would not be any way burdenſome unto his Confederates. But at the preſent he muſt needs entreat them, having thus haſtily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many neceſſaries; that they would help him with Corn and other Victuals, whereof he ſtood in need. So he left them to their conſultation: the concluſion whereof was, after a little diſpute, (for a vain motion was made by ſome, that the differences between the Romans and them ſhould be put by Compromiſe to the deciſion of Antiochus) That they would yield unto the Kings deſire, and aſſiſt him with all their forces. Here we may obſerve, how vain a thing it is for an abſolute Prince to engage himſelf, as did Antiochus, in a buſineſs of dangerous importance, upon the promiſed aſſurance of a State that is meerly popular. For if the vehemency of Thoas, and ſome other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council: the Ætolians, for gain of two or three Towns, yea for hope of ſuch gain that might have deceived them; were like to have abandoned this King their friend, unto the diſcretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had ſo fallen out? He could have bemoaned himſelf to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he muſt have been contented with this anſwer, That the fault was in thoſe of the oppoſite ſide; whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked Men. It happened much better for the preſent; though in the future it proved much worſe, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was choſen General of all their forces: and thirty Commiſſioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. Theſe armed ſuch as readily they could, whilſt it was in diſpute where they ſhould begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meeteſt place to be firſt undertaken: whither if they came ſuddenly, they ſhould not peradventure need to uſe much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thouſand Foot; leaving the reſt behind him at Demetrias. With theſe he haſted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magiſtrates, and ſome of the chief Citizens, iſſued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and falſe ſemblance ſet Greece at liberty. But ſuch liberty as might be true and uſeful, they ſaid would never be obtained; until by removing the neceſſity of obeying their pleaſure that were moſt mighty, every ſeveral Eſtate had where to find redreſs of any preſſure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoiſe, yea to over-weigh the Romans: who nevertheleſs deſired them only, ſo to joyn with him in League, as that if either the Romans or He ſhould offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to ſeek redreſs at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the ſame anſwer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but abſolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whoſe good liking, they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they ſpake of themſelves, they could likewiſe affirm of all the Greeks: foraſmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept under, by any Garriſon; or lived otherwiſe than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto condition which diſpleaſed them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King ſhould thus trouble himſelf, to deliver Cities that were already free. But ſince he, and the Ætolians, requeſted their friendſhip: they beſought both him, and the Ætolians, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in ſuch good caſe as they were. With this anſwer the King departed: for he was not, as then, ſtrong enough to force them. But very ſoon after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yield, before all the ſuccours could arrive, which Titus had ſent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the reſt of the Iſland ſhortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over-late to have defended Chalcis, repoſed themſelves at Delium, a little Town of Bœotia, lying over againſt the Iſland; where was a Temple and Grove, conſecrated unto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were ſome of them walking, and beholding the things there to be ſeen, whilſt others were buſied as they found cauſe: without fear of any danger; as being in ſuch a place, and no War hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himſelf in many vain Treaties of Peace; took advantage of their careleſneſs, and uſed them with all extremity of War. Very few of them eſcaped: fifty were taken; and the reſt ſlain. Hereat Quintius was grieved: yet ſo as it pleaſed him well to conſider, that his Romans had now more juſt cauſe, than before, to make War upon the King.

Antiochus liked well theſe beginnings, and ſent Embaſſadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation ſhould perſwade very many to take his part. The wiſer ſort returned ſuch anſwer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reſerved themſelves until he ſhould come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He muſt hold them excuſed for not daring to ſtir; or, if He came, the Romans muſt pardon their juſt fear, in yielding to the ſtronger. None of thoſe that lay far off, joyned with him in true meaning; ſave the Eleans, that always favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reaſon there was, that he ſhould think to draw the Achæans to his party. Nevertheleſs he aſſayed them, upon a vain hope that the envy, which Titus was ſaid to bear unto Philopœmens vertue, had bred a ſecret diſlike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both He and the Ætolians ſent Embaſſadors to the Council at Ægium, that ſpared not brave words, if the Achæans would have ſo been taken. The Kings Embaſſador told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming: reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans and Caduſians; names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable Men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; ſuch indeed as could not be reſiſted. Now concerning Money, and all Warlike furniture; it was, he ſaid, well known, that the Kingdoms of Aſia had always thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who conſidering the late War made againſt Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the caſe was too far different. Yet this moſt powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmoſt parts of the Eaſt; requeſted no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themſelves as neutral, and quietly look on, whilſt He took order with the Romans. To the ſame effect ſpake the Ætolian Embaſſador: and further added, That in the Battel at Cynoſcephalæ, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both He and his Army had been there deſtroyed, had they not been protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was preſent at the Council, and heard all this: to which he made as fit anſwer, as could have been deſired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embaſſador, nor the Ætolian, did ſo greatly labour to perſwade thoſe unto whom they addreſſed their Orations; as to vaunt themſelves the one unto the other. So as a man might well diſcern, what good correſpondence in vanity it was, that had thus lincked the King and the Ætolians together. For even ſuch brags as here they made, before the Achæans who knew them to be liers, had the Ætolians alſo made unto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory over Philip to be meerly their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they been feaſted by the King, with ſuch tales as his Embaſſador told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimæans, and a Many others; that were all but a company of Syrians, ſuch as were wont to be ſold about for bondſlaves, and good for little elſe. Theſe diverſe names of raſcal People were, he ſaid, like to the diverſity of Veniſon, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no ſuch vaunter as were theſe Embaſſadors) had ſometime feaſted him. For all that variety, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Hoſt then merrily told him; than ſo many pieces of one tame Swine, dreſt after ſeveral faſhions with variety of Sawces. Setting therefore aſide this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgment of the great King, by his preſent doings. He had, notwithſtanding all this great noiſe, no more than ten thouſand Men about him: for which little Army he was fain, in a manner, to beg Victuals of the Ætolians; and take up Money at uſury, to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there ſhut out, to Demetrias again. Theſe were the fruits of lies; wherewith ſince both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they ſhould, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilſt wiſer Men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much perſwaſion is needleſs. The Achæans did not love ſo well the Ætolians, as to deſire that they ſhould become Princes of Greece: but rather wiſhed to ſee them, of all other, made the verieſt abjects. Wherefore they ſtood not to hearken after news, what Antiochus did, how he ſped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War againſt him, and againſt the Ætolians.

How the hatred between theſe two Nations grew inveterate; ſufficiently appears in the ſtory foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwiſely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent ſpirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at reſt: there was nothing more greatly to have been deſired, than that they might never find occaſion to return with an Army thither again. And in this reſpect ought the Greeks to have ſought, not how Smyrna and Lampſacus might recover their liberty (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, until now of late) but how the powers of the Eaſt and Weſt, divided and kept aſunder by their Country, as two Seas by an Iſthmus or neck of land, might be kept from overflowing the Bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their ſeeking to make free thoſe baſe Aſiatiques, which originally were Greekiſh; than the general applauſe wherewith all the Nation entertained this their loving offer.

Yet

Yet were Lysimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of fear, that should move them to take Arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising joyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole Forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stir against them: then had not only this quarrel been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Countrey, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtful answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his Enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly received him, as soon as he entered upon their borders, not so much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had been somewhat hardly used. Aminander, the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himself to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two Sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his Sister to the poor Court of Athamania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedigree; he was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high Parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander, his fore-father; it was their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoof: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himself, or of his Sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own Phrenzy, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his Subjects; or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to do good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynoscephalæ, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedoans: whom their King had suffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended meerly unto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready, with all his power, to aid them wherein soever they should be pleased to use him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, and Athamanians, having now all joyned with him; Antiochus took counsel of them about the prosecution of the War in hand. The chief question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessaly, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone until the Spring: becaus it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his own Sentence, with the weightiest Reasons which he could alledg; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been cast aside, as a Vessel of no use; but was now required to deliver his Opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would have spoken, had his counsel at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poor Estates, that, wanting force of their own, did adjoyn themselves for fear unto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same fear for their excuse? wherefore he thought it most behoveful, to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoil and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had means to sustain the Roman War with his proper Forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to joyn with them; the benefit likely to redound unto himself, by their Society, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of his hope? For, said he, These Ætolians here present; and namely this Thoas, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motives which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told us, that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that King to some Wild Beast, that was chained, or locks up within some Grate, and would fain break loose. If this be so, let us break his Chain, and pull down the Gate; that he may regain his liberty, and satisfie his angry stomach, upon those that are common Enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his fear be greater than his indignation; then shall it behove us to look unto him, that he may not seek to please his good Masters the Romans, by offending us. Your Son Seleucus, is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage; let Seleucus be in readiness, to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great Enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans; I told you my Opinion at the beginning. Whereto had you then given ear; the Romans by this time should have heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy and Gaule should have been on fire with War: and, little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet, and Army hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, loaden with store of Victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouths.) Whereof let the one half be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other half, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the Affairs of Greece, and therewithal make countenance, as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice: who though perhaps I am not very skilful in all sorts of War: yet how to war with the Romans, I have been inſtructed by long experience, both to their coſt and mine own. Of this counſel which I give, I promiſe you my faithful and diligent ſervice for the execution: but what counſel ſoever you ſhall pleaſe to follow; I wiſh it may be proſperous. Many were pleaſed with the great Spirit of the man, and ſaid, he had ſpoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; ſave only that one was ſent into Aſia, to make all things ready there. In the mean while they went in hand with Theſſaly; about which they had before diſputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own ſtrength, were glad to make ſubmiſſion. But Lariſſa, that was chief of the Countrey, ſtood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the Walls with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Bæbius, a Roman Propraetor did ſend help thither. Likewiſe Philip of Macedon, profeſſed himſelf Enemy unto Antiochus: where by the fame of the ſuccour coming to Lariſſa, grew ſuch, as wrought more than the ſuccour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many Fires on the Mountains tops afar off, thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excuſing himſelf by the time of the year, he brake up his Siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Town: whom, without regard of the much diſproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, he ſhortly married; and ſo ſpent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon the War in hand. His great men and Captains followed his Example; and the Souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in ſuch wiſe, that when he took the Field, he might evidently perceive in what looſe manner of Diſcipline his Army had paſſed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Conſul, ſhall meet him very ſhortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looſeneſs of Nuptial Revels; by ſetting them to harder Exerciſe.

M. Acilius was choſen Conſul with P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica. The War againſt Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwiſe he was no way ſo honourable, as Naſica his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far leſs credit and importance. Naſica, beſides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long ſince, in time of the Punick War, crowned with the title of The beſt man in Rome: when the Senate, for very fear and ſuperſtition, durſt not have ſo pronounced him, had they not ſo thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very beſt, ſhould entertain an old ſtone, which the Devil then taught them to call the Mother of the Gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gave ſuch advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province; or arrogate more unto himſelf, than his lot ſhould afford him. This unpartial diſtribution of Employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make War againſt the Boijans: wherein he purchaſed the honour of a Triumph, nothing ſo glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchaſed with harder ſervice, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thouſand Foot, two thouſand Horſe, and fifteen Elephants. Ptolemy, King of Ægypt, notwithſtanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip, King of Macedon, had lately ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in perſon with all his Forces into Ætolia, there to aſſiſt the Conſul in this War. Ptolemy ſent alſo Gold and Silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earneſt. But he was too young, and dwelt too far off. So his Money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refuſed. Unto Philip's Embaſſadors anſwer was made, That this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themſelves beholding to him, for the aſſiſtance that he ſhould give to Acilius the Conſul. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and the Carthaginians, did ſtrive, which of them ſhould be moſt forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promiſed a great quantity of Grain; which they would ſend partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Maſaniſſa far out-went the poor City of Carthage: as alſo, in that he offered to lend the Conſul five hundred Horſe, and twenty Elephants. On the other ſide, the Carthaginians undertook to ſet out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-money, which was behind, and ought to be diſcharged by many yearly Penſions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themſelves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn; it was accepted with Condition, That they ſhould be contented to receive the price of it.

The haſty and ridiculous iſſue of this War, that began with ſuch noiſe and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, between the Roman and the Aſiatick Souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few Towns of Acarnania, after the ſame manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by fair words, and treaſon of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to prove their Excuſe, when they ſhould again forſake him. But King Philip and Bæbius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Conſul being arrived, againſt whom none made reſiſtance; he was glad to withdraw himſelf. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good ſervice to the Romans. Philip, the Brother of Aminander's Wife, was taken by the Conſul; made a Mocking-ſtock; and ſent away Priſoner to Rome. The Theſſalians uſed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gave up themſelves: the Garriſons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet ſo, that a thouſand of them ſtaid behind, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who having withdrawn himſelf to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out upon his friends: and ſaid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deal of toil during one half of a Winter, and ſpent the other half in ſuch Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, he found all the promiſes of the Ætolians meerly verbal; and himſelf reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wiſe man, yea a very Prophet, that had foreſeen all this long before. Nevertheleſs he ſent word to the Ætolians, that they ſhould now make ready all their Forces: as conſidering their own need to be no leſs than his. But the Ætolians had cauſe to think, that they themſelves were ſhamefully diſappointed by Antiochus: who having promiſed to do great wonders, ders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellows had done their best, in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He seized upon the Streights of Thermopylæ: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, until more help should come. Of the Streights of Thermopylæ there hath been spoken enough * before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to pass that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece: unless they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three days together, against a World of men coming to invade the Countrey. The latter, having taken upon him to do great Miracles, and effect what he listed himself in Greece: did commit himself unto the safety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whilst he lay, he sent earnest Massages one after other to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at leastwise now to help, and keep the tops of the Mountains, left the Romans finding any by-path, should come down upon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the few passages: by which only, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himself encouraged his Army: not only by telling them, with what base-conditioned Enemies they had to deal: but what rich Kingdoms Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were Victors. This was on the day before the Battel. All that night Cato had a sore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, save only that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilful Guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing up steepy Rocks, and crooked ways: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himself. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a fair way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neither had this entrance of the Thermopylæ been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any Travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best; yet did it lead him to a Bog at the end, which would suffer him to pass no further. So he staid there until day light: by which he discovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him; and some of the Ætolians very near unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lusty Crew of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service; and willed them by any means to get him some Prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Ætolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set upon the Ætolians; overthrew them; slew a great part of them; and chaced the rest: that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The Fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found it in a manner a desperate piece of work to assault the Camp it self; which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kind of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and poured down a shower of Weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman Arms and Ensigns were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsook the Camp, and fled. The Slaughter was not great: for that the badness of the way, did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this days loss drave Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

* L. 3. Ch. 6. §. 3.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their Gates; and presenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of Suppliants. Briefly, in few days all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only standing out, because they knew not what else to do. Neither did the Consul give them any respite. At his return from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyn with him against Antiochus: over whom, since the Victory was already gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good success; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his work hard; especially Philip, who fain would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Mine, were overmuch hindred by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the Spoil of these Towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himself; until such time as another Consul, was ready to ease him of his charge.

The loss of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire Peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight; entreating him not to for-forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from coming in person, at leastwise to help them with Money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour; but appertained unto his own safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a sum of Money, that might serve to defray the charges of the War: promising, that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadors, he retained with him; who willingly staid, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope, of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain Peace, upon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience; but said, He had other business in hand: only He granted them Ten days of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata; they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledg how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the Malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledg their fault, and to intreat pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the Faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This Phrase of committing unto the Faith; signified, in their use of it, little else, than the acknowledgment of a Fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said He, I command you first of all, That none of ye presume to go into Asia, upon any business, private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicæarchus the Ætolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreymen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilst he was yet speaking, Phameas, the Embassador, interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custom of the Greeks, who had yielded themselves unto his Faith; not unto Slavery. What? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custom with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a Chain. With that, Chains were brought; and an Iron Collar, by his appointment, fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumb, and knew not what to say. But Valerius, and some others, intreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himself: and said, That neither He, nor yet the Apocleti, or ordinary Council of the Nation, were able to fulfil these injunctions; without approbation of the general Assembly. For which cause He intreated yet further Ten days respite; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

* Legat. excerpt. è Polyb. 13.

This Surceasance of War, during Ten and other Ten days together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had been commanded away from Lamia, that else he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in Employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him, in the continuance of this War: He was desired to set upon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations, their borderers, whilst the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And He got in that space all Athamania, Perrhæbia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befaln their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War; yet they could not endure to hear more talk of peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with Money, and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His Money Nicander conveyed into Lamia, by very unusual dexterity. But he himself being to pass further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassage, was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good; but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his Servants to intreat Nicander friendly: and he himself being then at Supper, did visit him as soon as he rose up; giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madness; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance, first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himself, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had never made any trial: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signifie unto his Countreymen; and privately to hold in mind the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata; He lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was always after dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon: so as in the War of Perseus he made himself suspected unto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome; where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it; he forthwith meant to prosecute the War against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make Head against him at Naupactus: whither he therefore di-directly marched, to try what they could or durſt. The Siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had pre-conceived it: for it was a ſtrong City, and well manned. But Acilius ſtood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he ſhould have been a loſer, by riſing from before it without Victory. So he ſtaid there well-near all the following time of his Conſulſhip; whilſt the Macedonian King, and the Achæans, made far better uſe of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is ſaid before, being allowed to take in ſuch places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the ſtrong City of Demetrias; and with an haſty courſe of Victory, ſubdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to account the Eleans and Meſſenians: which had long been addicted to the Ætolian ſide; and followed it in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they ſaved themſelves from trouble a while. The Meſſenians being more ſtout, before they were invaded, had none other help, when the Achæan Prætor waſted their Countrey, than to offer themſelves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they ſent word, That at his Commandment, their Gates ſhould be opened; but that unto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yield. A Meſſage from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did ſuffice to call home the Army, and finiſh the War: as alſo the peremptory Command of the ſame Titus, cauſed the Meſſenians to annex themſelves unto the Achæans, and become part of their Common-weal. Such was now the Majeſty of a Roman Embaſſador. Titus did favour the Achæans; yet could not like it well, that either they, or any other, ſhould take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were ſtrong enough to defend it againſt any of their neighbours. That they ſhould make themſelves great Lords, and able to diſpute with the Romans upon even terms; it was no part of his deſire. They had lately bought the Iſle of Zacynthus, which had once been Philip's, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who ſent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this preſent War, was driven out of his own Kingdom by Philip: then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to ſell the Iſland to the Achæans; whom he found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this; but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies, as a reward of the Victory which they had obtained. It was bootleſs to diſpute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themſelves unto his diſcretion. So he told them, That their Common-wealth was like a Tortoiſe, whereof Peloponneſus was the ſhell: and that holding themſelves within that compaſs, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they ſhould lie open to blows, which might greatly hurt them. Having ſetled things thus in Peloponneſus, He went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio, the Conſul, had lain Two Months, that might have been far better ſpent. There, whether out of compaſſion which He had upon the Ætolians, or out of diſlike of King Philip's thriving ſo faſt: He perſwaded the Conſul to grant unto the beſieged, and to the whole Nation, ſo long Truce, that they might ſend Embaſſadors to Rome; and ſubmitting themſelves, crave pardon of the Senate. Moſt like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: elſe would not the Ætolians have made ſuch earneſt ſuit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had been ſure to carry it, in any ſhort ſpace; it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; ſince the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flower of the Nation, would have made the promiſed ſubmiſſion much more humble and ſincere. When they came to Rome, no intreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of theſe two; That either they ſhould wholly permit themſelves to the good pleaſure of the Senate; Or elſe pay a thouſand Talents, and make neither Peace nor War with any, further than as the Romans ſhould give approbation. They had not ſo much Money: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withal, if they ſhould give themſelves away unto diſcretion; which what it ſignified, they now underſtood. Wherefore they deſired to have it ſet down, in what Points, and how far forth, they ſhould yield unto the good pleaſure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain anſwer: ſo that they were diſmiſſed as Enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilſt the Ætolians were purſuing their hopes of Peace, the Conſul had little to do in Greece; and therefore took upon him gravely to ſet things in order among the tractable Achæans. He would have had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedæmonians home into their Countrey; and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhip of their Common-wealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans ſhould be medling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer Grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to be admitted; and ſaw that they ſhould have their deſire, without ſuch compulſive mediation.

The Roman Admiral, C. Livius, much about the ſame time, fought a Battel at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admiral to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty Sail of Rhodians came after the battel, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of Sail: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquiſhed in fight, was yet out of danger, as ſoon as he betook himſelf to a ſpeedy retreat.

And ſuch end had the firſt years War, between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuſe themſelves by fear; thinking themſelves happy when by Embaſſadors they had obtained Pardon. On the contrary ſide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-Enemy of late unto the Romans, did now ſend to gratulate this their Victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reſtored unto him Demetrius, his younger Son; whom ſome few years they had kept as an Hoſtage. Alſo King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, ſent word how greatly all Aſia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard He deſired the Senate not to foreſlow time; but to ſend an Army, as ſoon as might be, into Aſia: promiſing, that his aſſiſtance, wherein ſoever it pleaſed them to uſe it, ſhould not be wanting. This Ptolemy was the Son in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the Friend of Fortune. He underſtood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The ſame did Antiochus now begin to ſuſpect, who had thought himſelf a while as ſafe at Epheſus, as if he had been in another World: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not ſo far out of Greece into Aſia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt, but the Romans would ſoon be there, and make him try the chance of a battel for his Kingdom.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius, the African, his Elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is ſent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that ſo he might at leiſure paſs into Aſia. Much troubleſome buſineſs by Sea; and divers fights. An invaſion upon Eumenes his Kingdom; with the Siege of Pergamus, raiſed by an handful of the Achæans. L. Scipio, the Conſul, comes into Aſia: where Antiochus moſt earneſtly deſireth Peace, and is denied it. The Battel of Magneſia: wherein Antiochus being vanquiſhed, yieldeth to the Romans good pleaſure. The Conditions of the Peace. In what ſort the Romans uſed their Victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a moſt ſumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is ſurnamed The Aſiatique, as his Brother was ſtiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the Brother of P. Scipio, the African, was choſen Conſul at Rome, with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being deſirous (as generally all Conſuls were) of the more honourable Employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement, of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be ſo pleaſed, the diſpoſition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his Brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a queſtion had not of long time been put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more deſirous, to make an unblamable Decree. But the matter being otherwiſe ſomewhat indifferent; P. Scipio, the African, ſaid openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his Brother to the War againſt Antiochus, He himſelf would follow his Brother in that War, as his Lieutenant. Theſe Words were heard with ſuch approbation, that the controverſie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and ſhould happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain: what better man could they oppoſe, than Scipio; that had been victorious againſt the ſame great Worthy. But indeed a worſer man might have ſerved well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no abſolute Command, nor ſcarce any truſt of great importance: excepting now and then in conſultation; where his Wiſdom was much approved, but his liberty and high Spirit as much diſliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a ſign of the freedom that he uſed in his cenſures, even whilſt he lived in ſuch a Court. Antiochus muſtered his Army in preſence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may ſeem, to have made him wiſh, that he had been ſerved by ſuch brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with ſuch coſtly Furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-ſhine day. Whereupon the King, well-pleaſing himſelf with that goodly Spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans? Enough (ſaid Hannibal) were the Romans the moſt covetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Coſt upon the backs of Cowardly Aſiatiques, was no better than a Spoil to animate good Souldiers. How little this anſwer pleaſed the King; it is eaſie to gueſs. The little uſe that he made of this Carthaginian, teſtifies that his diſlike of the Man, cauſed him to loſe the uſe of his Service, when he ſtood in greateſt neceſſity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haſte away from Rome as ſoon as they could. They carried with them, beſides other Souldiers newly preſt to the War, about five thouſand Voluntaries, that had ſerved under P. Africanus. There was alſo a Fleet of Thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and Twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Æmylius Regillus, that was choſen Admiral the ſame year for that Voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Conſul Glabrio beſieging Amphiſſa, a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied Peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town: but kept all the paſſages thereto leading; which heedleſly, as in a time of confuſion, they had left unguarded the laſt year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long ſince much weakned by Philip, and now by him attempted on the ſudden, was carried at the ſecond aſſault. Thence went He to Amphiſſa; which he had almoſt gotten; when L. Scipio, his Succeſſor, came with thirteen thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphiſſa was preſently forſaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Caſtle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaſſadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalf of the Ætolians; intreating him to ſtand their Friend, and help them in obtairing ſome tolerable Condition of Peace. He gave them gentle words: and willed them to perſwade the Ætolians, that they ſhould faithfully, and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many Meſſages paſſing to and fro; though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul made ſtill the ſame anſwer, with which they had been chaced from Rome. The concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from War: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpful commodity which time ſhould afford. So they obtained half a years Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another half years leiſure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio; who thought all time loſt, which withheld the War from paſſing over into Aſia.

The buſineſs of Ætolia being thus laid aſide: and the old Conſul, Glabrio, ſent home into Italy: the Scipio's marched into Theſſaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace, unto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidered, That hereby they muſt commit themſelves unto the loyalty of King Philip; who might either do them ſome miſchief by the way, if he were diſpoſed to watch a notable advantage: or at the leaſt, would he be unfaithful, though he were not ſo couragious; yet might he take ſuch order with the Thracians, that even for want of Victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they ſhould be diſgracefully forced to return. He had promiſed them the utmoſt of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant ſincerely, they thought to make ſome trial; by cauſing a Gentleman to ride ride Poſt unto him, and obſerve his doings, as he ſhould take him on the ſudden. The King was merry at a Feaſt, and drinking, when the Meſſenger came: whom he lovingly bad welcom; and ſhewed him the next day, not only what proviſion of Victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made Bridges over the Rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to paſs. With theſe good news Gracchus returned back in haſte unto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readineſs, that might help to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally; and brought them on their way, even to the Helleſpont; where they ſtaid a good while, until their Navy was in readineſs to tranſport them into Aſia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though for the moſt part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admiral of Antiochus, was a baniſhed Rhodian; true to the King, and deſirous of revenge upon his Countreymen that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea; thought to do ſomewhat upon thoſe that were ſo early in their diligence, before their fellows ſhould arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work; and ſent word, as in great ſecrecy, to the Rhodian Admiral, That if the Sentence of his baniſhment might be repealed, He would, in requital thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many paſſages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admiral grew ſo careleſs, expecting ſtill, when he ſhould receive a Watch-word from Polyxenidas, that he himſelf was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet ſetting forth from Epheſus by night; and, for fear of being diſcovered, reſting one day in harbour by the way; came the ſecond night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Haven. Pauſiſtratus the Rhodian Admiral, ſeeing this, thought it his beſt way of reſiſtance, to beſtow his Men on the two Head-lands, or points of the Haven; ſo to guard the mouth of it: for that he ſaw no likelihood of defending himſelf by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed ſome Companies, in another part of the Iſland: which falling upon the back of Pauſiſtratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his Men aboard. This could not be without great confuſion; ſo as the Enemies took him out of all order; and ſunk or boarded all his Navy, five excepted, that by a ſudden device made ſhift to eſcape. Each of them hung out a burning Creſſet upon two poles, at the Beak-head: and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemy: who having not bethought himſelf what ſhift to make againſt ſuch unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto theſe deſperate Gallies; for fear leſt they ſhould burn, together with themſelves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had ſome loſs by tempeſt: whereof Polyxenidas could not take ſuch advantage as he had hoped; becauſe, putting to Sea for that purpoſe, He was driven back again by the like foul Weather. But the Rhodians, to ſhew that they were not diſcouraged, ſet forth Twenty other Gallies: the Romans alſo, with King Eumenes, repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery, preſented battel to Polyxenidas, before the Haven of Epheſus. When he durſt not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were intreated by the Rhodians, or perſwaded by ſome appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by ſtorms at Sea; and another while by ſtrong reſiſtance, made againſt them at Land.

Eumenes, with his Fleet, was compelled to forſake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus waſted all the grounds about Elæa and Pergamus: and leaving his Son Seleucus, to beſiege the Royal City of Pergamus, did with the reſt of his Army ſpoil the whole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay againſt it. Wherefore he had reaſon to ſtand in fear; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thouſand Foot, and an hundred Horſe of the Achæans, old Souldiers all, and trained up under Philopœmen; whoſe Scholar, in the Art of War, Diophanes, their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the Walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanor of the Enemy; began to diſdain, that ſuch men as they ſhould hold him beſieged. For Seleucus his Army, which was encamped at the Hill-foot, ſeeing that none durſt ſally forth upon them, grew ſo careleſs; as otherwiſe, than by ſpoiling all behind their backs, they ſeemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrey. Diophanes therefore ſpake with Attalus; and told him, that he would go forth to viſit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he ſaid, that the Match was nothing equal. But the Achæan would needs have his will: and iſſuing forth, encamped not far from the Enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the beſiegers; they wondred at firſt what his meaning was: but when they ſaw that he held himſelf quiet, they made a jeſt of his boldneſs; and laughed to ſee with what an handful of men he looked ſo ſtoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence and diſorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his Men to follow him, even as faſt as they well might: and he himſelf, with the Hundred Horſe, brake out on the ſudden upon the Station that was next at hand. Very few of the Enemies had their Horſes ready ſadled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make reſiſtance: ſo as he drave them all out of their Camp; and chaced them as far as he might ſafely adventure, with great ſlaughter of them, and no loſs of his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the Walls of the Town, Men and Women, to behold this Spectacle) were very joyful; and highly magnified the vertue of theſe Achæans. Yet would they not therefore iſſue forth of their Gates, to help the Achæans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped half a Mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and againſt him went forth Diophanes the ſecond time; who quietly reſted a while in his old Station. When they had ſtaid many hours, looking who ſhould begin; Seleucus, in fair order, as he came, withdrew himſelf toward his lodging, that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilſt the Enemy was in ſight: but as ſoon as the ground between them hindred the proſpect, he followed them in all haſte; and ſoon overtaking them with his Horſe, charged them in Rear; ſo as he brake them, and with all his Forces, purſued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldneſs of the Achæans, and the baſeneſs of his own men, cauſed Seleucus to quit the Siege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of theſe Aſiatiques, Philopœmen had cauſe to tell the Romans, That he envied their Victory. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis, after his Marriage, and his Souldiers betook themselves to Riot, as it had been in a time of great security: a good man of War might have cut all their throats, even as they were tipling in their Victualing-houses; which Philopœmen said that he would have done, had He been General of the Achæans, and not, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of business: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travel, brought almost nothing to pass. He had been at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himself, with a few of his Horse, and light Armature. Before Pergamus he left his Son, as before hath been shewed, and went to Elæa: whither he heard that Æmylius, the Roman Admiral, was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of Peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Æmylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treaty brake off. Then followed the Overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the Siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns, of scarce any worth or note, were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty sail, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a Retreat, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions, which were but as Præfaces unto the War; the last and greatest was a Victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas, the Kings Admiral. The Battel was fought by Myonnesus, a Promontory in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourscore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last year, That his Armada should cover all the Shoars of Greece. The Romans had Eight and Fifty Gallies; the Rhodians, Two and Twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light timber'd, and thin plankt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which, five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their Prows they ran upon the Enemy: who declining them for fear, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoisted Sail: and having a fair Wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet Forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof Thirteen were taken: all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans, and their fellows, lost only two or three Ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had been remaining, to defend those places that he held in Europe: He presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the besiegers (if the Siege had been continued obstinately) to terms of great extremity. He also gave over the Siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought, save only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarathes, the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not only came to the Hellespont; but had yielded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readiness, to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that He landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Countrey had been his already. The first news that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassador that came to sue for Peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining Peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all Disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsachus, and Lysimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strive with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with War? If it was their desire, that any other Towns upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at liberty, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain; and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise bear half the Charges, whereat they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent upon confidence of their fortune; He expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassador seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should bear all the charges of the War, since it began through his only fault: and that he should not only depart out of those few Towns which he held in Æolis and Ionia; but quite out of Asia the less, and keep himself on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassador therefore saw, that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantity of Gold, together with the free restitution of his Son; who (it is uncertain by what mischance) was taken Prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of Gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his Son, than upon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publick business: He only said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the War to take hold on his own Kingdom: there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yield to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would advise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no less, than if he had been already subdued: little reason there was, that he should fear to come to battel; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him threethreescore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed With Hooks or Sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to hear that the Consul drew near him apace, as one hastning to fight. But howsoever he was affected; He made so little shew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elæa, He sent thither unto him his Son without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and withal not desirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own safety. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be supected, that herein he dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of Wealth, might pay: better it was to do such a courtesie before the Battel, as would afterwards have been little worth; than to stay until the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recovery of his Son: so as the joy thereof was thought, to have been much available unto his Health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He said only thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by advising him not to fight, until he shall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his Counsel: and therefore withdrew himself from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, he fortified himself as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and sate down within four miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some loss driven back over the River. Two days were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would pass the Water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, until they came within two miles and an half of Antiochus his Camp. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand, Horse and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps du gard repelled. Four days together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came half way forward, and presented Battel; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, far from any Countrey of their Friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unless they would stain their Honour by returning far back, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the War untill the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the general Crie, that this great Army should be be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were so many Beasts to be slaughtered, than Men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the Fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his Men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy; resolved to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the Field again, and ordered their Battels: He also did the like; and advanced so far, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latin: in each of which were five thousand and four hundred Men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points; the Romans in the main Battel. All of them, according to their wonted Form, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at such distance as was usual; and last of all, the Triarii. Now besides these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right Wing. Utmost of all (save some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left Wing was fenced by the Bank of the River: yet four Troops of Horse were placed there; though such help seemed in a manner needless. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Camp. The Consul had with him sixteen African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men: as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater, and more couragious Beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the several kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The main strength of his Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the midst, and divided into ten Battallions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battallion were two Elephants, goodly Beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their Backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible Shew. On the right hand of these were fifteen hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse; and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and accompanied by some others. All which Troops of Horse divided in their several kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoyning to these were sixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand was the Kings own Regiment: called the Argyraspides or Silver-shields, by a name borrowed from their Furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name that had served under Great Alexander: then twelve hundred Archers on Horseback, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with four thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations, and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were calle the Kings Troop, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the the Dromedaries, whereon ſet Arabians with long Rapiers that would ſerve to reach from thoſe high Camels. Beyond theſe were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Piſidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and many others, having alſo with them ſixteen Elephants. Antiochus himſelf commanded in the right Wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principal Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The firſt onſet was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horſe; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eaſily made fruſtrate the danger threatned by them both. For with ſhoutings, and noiſes, and ſome wounds, they were driven out of the Field; and running back upon their own men, did the ſame harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horſe following this advantage, charged upon the left Wing: where they found no reſiſtance; ſome being out of order; others being without courage. It is ſhameful to rehearſe, and ſo ſtrange, that it may hardly ſeem credible: that the Phalangiers, with ſuch variety of Auxiliaries, made little or no reſiſtance; but all of them fled, in a manner as ſoon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himſelf, being in the left Wing of his own Battel: and ſeeing the Latines, that ſtood oppoſite unto him weakly flancked with Horſe; gave upon them couragiouſly, and forced them to retire. But M. Æmilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, iſſued forth with all his power to help his Fellows: and, what by perſwaſion, what by threats, made them renew the Fight. Succour alſo came from the right Wing, where the Romans were already Victorious: whereof when Antiochus diſcovered the approach, he not only turned his Horſe about, but ran away upon the ſpur without further tarriance. The Camp was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is ſaid to have loſt in this Battel fifty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe; beſides thoſe that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not ſlain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horſe: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the ſame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the cuſtody of Sardes, and the Caſtle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Townſ-men and Souldiers were ſo diſmayed with the greatneſs of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in thoſe parts, without expecting Summons, yielded up themſelves by Embaſſadors: whom they ſent to the Romans, whilſt they were on the way. Neither were many days ſpent ere Antiochus his Embaſſador was in the Camp: having none other Errand, than to know what it would pleaſe the Romans to impoſe upon the King his Maſter. P. Scipio was now come to his Brother; who obtained leave to make the anſwer, becauſe it ſhould be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he ſhould quite abandon his Dominions on this ſide of Taurus. For their charges in that War they required fifteen thouſand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thouſand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome ſhould have confirmed the Peace; and the other twelve thouſand, in twelve years next enſuing by even Portions. Likewiſe they demanded four hundred Talents for Eumenes; and ſome ſtore of Corn, that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now beſides twenty Hoſtages which they required, very earneſt they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with ſome others who had ſtirred up the King to this War, delivered into their hands. But any wiſe man might ſo eaſily have perceived, that it would be their purpoſe to make this one of their principal demands; as no great art was needful to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaſſador had full commiſſion, to refuſe nothing that ſhould be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to ſend immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Conſuls choſen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volſo. The Ætolians deſiring Peace, but could not obtain it; becauſe they would except neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, that one of the Conſuls ſhould make War upon the Ætolians, the other upon Antiochus in Aſia. Now though ſhortly there came news, that Antiochus was already vanquiſhed in Battel, and had ſubmitted himſelf unto all that could be required at his hands: yet ſince the State of Aſia was not like to be ſo throughly ſetled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Aſia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this came the Embaſſadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and ſome other: yea by King Eumenes in Perſon; whoſe preſence added a goodly luſtre to the buſineſs in hand. Concerning the Peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no diſputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the diſtribution of the purchaſe. King Eumenes rekoned up his own deſerts: and comparing himſelf with Maſaniſſa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiful to him than they had been to the Numidian, ſince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Maſaniſſa was only ſuch in Title; and ſince both he and his Father had always been their Friends, even in the worſt of the Roman Fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He ſtill referring himſelf to their courteſie; and they deſiring him to ſpeak plain. At length he craved that they would beſtow upon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpoſe to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needful, that they ſhould trouble themſelves with the care of giving liberty to many of the Greek Towns, that were on Aſia ſide. For ſince the moſt of thoſe Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reaſon that they ſhould be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They deſired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to mind, that no ſmall part of Greece it ſelf had been ſubject unto Philip, and ſerved him in his War: which was not alledged againſt them as a cauſe why they ſhould not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they inſiſted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans againſt King Antiochus was ſo great, as eaſily might ſatisfie the deſires of all their Friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifully gave away ſo much, that every one had cauſe to be well pleaſed.

Such

Such end had the War againſt King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the Pomp whereof exceeded in Riches, not only that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld until that day. Now forasmuch as the ſurname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought covenient by ſome, to reward L. Scipio with the Title of The Aſiatick: which the fortune of his Victory had no leſs deſerved; though the vertue requiſite to the purchaſe thereof, was no way correſpondent.

The Ætolians and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquiſhed by the Roman Conſuls, Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have paſſed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Books of Hermes; and that Inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The Ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's. Of the beginning of Faction among the Roman Nobility.

Marc. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the ſame charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now ſtyled Aſiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greece and to Aſia. And for this reaſon was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted ſo long a Truce to the Ætolians. But ſince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not ſought to humble it ſelf to the Roman Majeſty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly Terms than any other of the Greeks. The beſt was, that ſo great a ſtorm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreſeen the danger, when their Embaſſadors were utterly denied Peace at Rome: and they had provided the laſt remedy; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become interceſſors for them. Neither were they ſo dejected, with any terrible apprehenſions, that they could not well deviſe, upon helping themſelves, even by re-purchaſe of Countries loſt, where they ſpied advantage.

Poor King Aminander lived in Exile among them, whilſt Philip of Macedon kept, for him, poſſeſſion of his Lands and Caſtles. But the Athamanians (beſides that many of them bore a natural affection to their own Prince) having been long accuſtomed to ſerve a Mountain Lord, that converſed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and inſolent manner of Command, uſed by the Captains of Philip his Garriſons. They ſent therefore ſome few of them to their King, and offered their ſervice toward his reſtitution. At the firſt there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet aſſurance, that all the reſt would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the borders with a thouſand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty adventurers, having divided themſelves into four parts, occupied, by the ready aſſiſtance of the Multitude, four the chief Towns in the Countrey, to his uſe. The fame of this good ſucceſs at firſt; with Letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their beſt in helping forward the Action: made the Lieutenants of Philip unable to think upon reſiſtance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few days; giving thereby ſome leiſure unto his King to provide for the reſcue. But when he had done his beſt, he was forced thence; and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loſt. Philip had brought from home ſix thouſand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in ſuch a running march, he left all ſave two thouſand behind him, and ſo came to Athenæum, a little Athamanian Caſtle that ſtill was his, as being on the Frontier of Macedon. Thence he ſent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argithea, that was chief of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldneſs to deſcend upon Argithea: for that they might perceive the Athamanians, all along the Hill ſides, ready to come down upon them, when they ſhould be buſie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a ſafe Retreat; eſpecially when Aminander came in ſight with his thouſand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back from-wards Argithea, and preſently withdrawn by their King towards his own Borders. But they were not ſuffered to depart in quiet, at their pleaſure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layed them, and purſued them ſo cloſely, that their Retreat was in manner of a plain Flight, with great loſs of Men and Arms; few of thoſe eſcaping that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding ſomewhat in the Countrey, until Philip his return.

The Ætolians, having found the buſineſs of Athamania ſo eaſie, made attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. Theſe had belonged unto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolian again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and ſo did ſtill purpoſe to continue. Theſe took Arms at firſt: but ſoon layed them away; ſeeing their Neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian Quarrel, and ſeeing their own King ſo haſtily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of theſe Victories the joy was the leſs; for that news came of Antiochus his laſt Overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Conſul his haſtning with an Army into Greece. Aminander ſent his excuſes to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in deſpight, that he had recovered his own from Philip, with ſuch help as he could get. Neither ſeems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his loſſes: for of this fault they neither were ſharp Correctors, nor earneſt Reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the buſineſs, about which he came, and layed ſiege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief Seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdom. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unleſs they would adventure to fight upon equal Ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were at the ſame time, vexed by the Illyrians at Sea, and ready to be driven from their new Conqueſt, by Perſeus the Son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with ſo many at once; and therefore as earneſtly ſought Peace with the Romans, as they ſtoutly made head againſt the reſt. In the mean while, the Athenian and Rhodian Embaſſadors came; who beſought the Conſul to grant them Peace. It helped well that Ambracia made ſtrong reſiſtance, and would not be terrified.

by any violence of the aſſaylants, or danger that might ſeem to threaten. The Conſul had no deſire to ſpend half his time about one City, and ſo be driven to leave unto his ſucceſſor the honour of finiſhing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and bad them ſeek Peace with faithful intent, without thinking it over-dear, at a reaſonable price; conſidering with how great a part of his Kingdom their friend Antiochus had made the ſame purchaſe. He alſo gave leave to Aminander, offering his Service as a mediator, to put himſelf into Ambracia, and try what good his perſwaſions might do with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuſes, the concluſion was ſuch, as was grievous to the weaker, but not unſufferable. The ſame Embaſſadors of the Athenians and Rhodians accompanied thoſe of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needful in this interceſſion, for that Philip had made very grievous complaint about the loſs of thoſe Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindred not the Peace, which thoſe good Mediators of Rhodes and Athens did earneſtly ſollicite. The Ætolians were bound to uphold the Majeſty of the People of Rome, and to obſerve divers Articles, which made them leſs free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any People of Greece; they having been the firſt that called theſe their Maſters into the Country. The Iſle of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themſelves (as not long ſince they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achæans, by ſtiffly preſſing their own right) that ſo they might have poſſeſſion along the coaſt of Greece, whilſt they ſeemed to forbear the Country. But concerning thoſe places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claim, there was ſet down an Order ſo perplexed, as would neceſſarily require to have the Romans Judges of the controverſies, when they ſhould ariſe. And hereof good uſe will be ſhortly made: when want of employment elſewhere, ſhall cauſe a more Lordly Inquiſition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Conſul, had at the ſame time War in Aſia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the ſame that had followed L. Scipio; of whoſe victory, his acts were the conſummation. He viſited thoſe Countries on the hither ſide of Taurus, that had ſcarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among theſe there were ſome petty Lords, or Tyrants, ſome free Cities, and ſome that were together at Wars, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Aſia. From every of theſe he got ſomewhat; and by their quarrels found occaſion to viſit thoſe Provinces, into which he ſhould elſe have wanted an Errand. He was even loaden with booty, when, having fetcht a compaſs about Aſia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. Theſe had long dominiered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their forepaſſed acts, than any preſent vertue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately ſuch trial, when they ſerved under King Antiochus, as made them to know themſelves far the worſe Men. Wherefore they thought it no ſmall part of their ſafety, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an Inland Country, where thoſe Enemies were not like to ſearch them out. But when ſuch hopes failed; and when ſome Princes of their own Nation, that had been friends of Eumenes, exhorted the reſt to yield: then was no Counſel thought ſo good, as to forſake their Houſes and Country, and, with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themſelves unto the high Mountains of Olympus and Margana. Theſe Mountains were exceeding hard of aſcent, though none ſhould undertake the cuſtody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as alſo the natural ſtrength being helpt, by ſuch fortification as promiſed greateſt aſſurance: it was thought, that the Conſul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or eaſily be repelled; and that finally, when he had ſtaied there a while, Winter, and much want, ſhould force him to diſlodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careleſs of furniſhing themſelves with caſting Weapons, as if the Stones would have ſerved well enough to that purpoſe: the Romans, who came far otherwiſe appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Arms, than impediment in diſadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did eaſily prevaile againſt caſters of Stones; eſpecially being ſuch as were theſe Gallo-Greeks, neither exerciſed in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their Stones before hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than thoſe of a fit ſize. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defenſive Arms, could not hold out againſt the Arrows and Weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of Ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the Mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had no other way left, than to caſt themſelves headlong down the ſteep Rocks. Few of the Men eſcaped alive: all their Wives, Children, and Goods, became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the reſt of that Nation overcome ſoon after, at the other Mountain: only more of them ſaved themſelves by flight, as having fairer way at their backs.

Theſe Wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retain as Proconſul his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his ſecond year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave Peace to thoſe whom he had vanquiſhed, as likewiſe to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and ſome others, not by him vanquiſhed, but ſubmitting themſelves for fear of the Roman Arms. He drew from them all what profit he could: and laid upon them ſuch conditions, as He thought expedient. He alſo did finiſh the league of Peace with Antiochus; whereto He ſwore, and received the Kings oath by Embaſſadors, whom he ſent for that purpoſe. Finally, having ſet in order the matters of Aſia, he took his way toward the Helleſpont, loaden with ſpoil, as carrying with him (beſides other treaſures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in ſo many years extorted, from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home rich in Money alone, or Cattel, or things of needful uſe, which the Roman Souldiers had been wont to take as the only good purchaſe; but furniſhed with ſumptuous Houſhold-ſtuff, and Slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Muſicians for Banquets; and, in a word, with the ſeeds of that luxury, which finally over-grew and choaked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Helleſpont and the Kingdom of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his Journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he paſſed through them, without any ſuch booty as might provoke them; or perhaps Liv. l. 39.

haps rather, becauſe Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians ſhould not ſtir. But when Manlius came along with an huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not ſo well contain themſelves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwiſe than very pleaſantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cauſe to be angry; ſeeing how little himſelf was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he underſtood, and afterwards gave the Romans to underſtand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his own Kingdom, if the People of Rome had not made War in Aſia: whereas contrariwiſe, Antiochus had offered unto himſelf three thouſand talents, and fifty Ships of War, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promiſing moreover to reſtore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the War began: he thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not only the half of Aſia, but Cherſonneſus and Lyſimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himſelf they beſtowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility, to go to Rome and beg Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the moſt honourable Men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correſpondence with him by Letters, whereby he made himſelf acquainted with the Wars in Spain and Africk. This perhaps he deemed ſufficient, to breed in the Romans a due reſpect of him. But Eumenes took a ſurer way. For the Scipio's had not the diſpoſing of that which they wan from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates aſſiſting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which thoſe Delegates were choſen, and inſtructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore ſaw theſe upſtart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as baſe companions, advanced ſo highly, and made greater than himſelf; yea himſelf unregarded, contemned, and expoſed to many wrongs: then found he great cauſe to wiſh, that he had not ſo haſtily declared himſelf againſt Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have been freed from his inſolent Maſters. But what great argument of ſuch diſcontentedneſs the Macedonian had, we ſhall very ſhortly be urged to diſcourſe more at large. At the preſent it was believed, that the Thracians were by him ſet on, to aſſail the Romans paſſing through their Country. They knew all advantages: and they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages, that were beſtowed in the midſt of the Army; whereof part had already paſſed a dangerous Wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet ſo far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting, and the ſaving, did coſt many lives, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themſelves; not without as much of the booty, as was to their full content. And of ſuch trouble there was more, though leſs dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdom they had a fair march into Epirus; and ſo to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: eſpecially to Manlius; whom ſome of the ten Delegates, appointed to aſſiſt him, did very bitterly tax, as an unworthy Commander. Touching the reſt of their accuſation; it ſufficeth that he made good anſwer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One clauſe is worthy of more particular conſideration. Reprehending his deſire to have hindred the Peace with Antiochus; they ſaid, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamity threatned by Sibyls verſes, unto thoſe that ſhould paſs the fatal bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls Prophecy threatned the Roman Captain or Army, that ſhould paſs over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the firſt, that marched with an Army beyond thoſe limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before hand won, in a ſort, the Countries on the other ſide of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his Race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we find not, that either Lucullus or Pompey ſuffered any loſs, in preſuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accompliſhment of this Prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the reſtitution of Ptolemy King of Ægypt; that was forbidden unto the Romans by the ſame Sibyl. It may therefore ſeem to have had reference unto the ſame things that were denounced, as like to happen upon the reduction of the Ægyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tully noteth, ſowed at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here diſpute. But I hold this more probable, than that the reſtitution of Ptolemy to his Kingdom by Gabinius the Roman, ſhould have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as ſome both ancient and modern Chriſtian Writers, have been well pleaſed to interpret Sibyl in that Prophecy. Of the Sibylline predictions I have ſometimes thought reverendly: though not knowing what they were (as I think, few Men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But obſervation of the ſhameful Idolatry, that upon all occaſions was advanced in Rome by the Books of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me ſuſpect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgment of Euſebius: when that learned and excellent work of Maſter Caſaubon upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only thoſe Prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Chriſt ſo plainly was foreſhewed, but even the Books of Hermes, which have born ſuch reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at firſt entertained (whoſoever deviſed them) by the undiſcreet zeal of ſuch, as delighted in ſeeing the Chriſtian Religion ſtrengthned with forreign proofs. And in the ſame rank, I think, we ought to place that notable Hiſtory, reported by Euſebius from no mean Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely of an Altar to him erected, with an Inſcription Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more ſtrange, than that a thing ſo memorable, and ſo publick, ſhould have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of thoſe times? Philoſophers and Poets would not have ſuffered the matter to eſcape in ſilence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flouriſhed, would have abſtained from ſpeaking any word of an Argument ſo famous. Wherefore I am perſwaded ſwaded, that this inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was by ſome bad Criticiſm, taken amiſs in place of Semoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruvius a Rebel, had many ages before been conſecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whoſe Chappel they were beſtowed. So as either by the ill ſhape of the old Roman Letters, or by ſome ſpoil that Time had wrought upon them; it might eaſily come to paſs, that the words ſhould be miſs-read, Simoni Sancto, and that ſome Chriſtian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon ſhould frame the conjecture, which now paſſeth for a true Hiſtory. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby alſo, many times, their faſhion is amended, and made more Hiſtorical, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be ſafe, to let our faith (which ought to ſtand firm upon a ſure foundation) lean over hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, poſt.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richeſt, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treaſury, was made the laſt paiment of thoſe Monies, which the Common-wealth had borrowed from private Men, in the ſecond Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had ſtill ſome feeling of Hannibal: which being paſt, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even as long as he well could: for that he thought it not ſafe, to make his entrance into the City, until the heat of an Inquiſition, then raging therein, ſhould be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into judgment, by two Tribunes of the People; Men, only by this accuſation, known to Poſterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that ſuch unworthy Men ſhould queſtion him, of purloining from the Common Treaſury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of anſwer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accuſed, but followed by a great train of his friends and Clients, with which he paſſed through the middeſt of the Aſſembly, and offered himſelf to ſpeak. Having audience, he told the People, That upon the ſame day of the year he had fought a great Battel with Hannibal, and finiſhed the Punick War by a ſignal victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit ſeaſon to brabble at the Law; but intended to viſit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter and the reſt of the Gods, by whoſe grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily diſcharged the moſt weighty buſineſs of the Common-wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requeſting them, That if ever ſince the ſeventeenth year of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deſerts had exceeded the greatneſs of thoſe honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might ſtill be like to him. Theſe words were heard with great approbation: ſo as all the People, even the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their own Slaves and a Crier, by whom ridiculouſly they cited him to judgment, until for very ſhame, as not knowing what elſe to do, they granted him, unrequeſted, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their ſuit, but enforce him to ſubmit himſelf to a diſgraceful trial: he willingly relinquiſhed the City, and his unthankful Romans, that could ſuffer him to undergo ſo much indignity. The reſt of his time he ſpent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any deſire of ſeeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year, in this voluntary baniſhment; it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the ſame year, with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as alſo of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he outlived the Tribuneſhip of his accuſers; who meant to have drawn him back to his anſwer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the reſt from proceeding) had not cauſed them to deſiſt. Howſoever it was; the ſame Tribunes went more ſharply to work with L. Scipio the Aſiatique. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching Money received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treaſury; That the Senate ſhould give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine, thereof. In favour of this Decree an Oration was made by Cato, the ſuppoſed Author of theſe contentions, and inſtigator of the Tribunes. He was a Man of great, but not perfect, vertue: temperate, valiant, and of ſingular induſtry; frugal alſo, both of the publick, and of his own; ſo as in this kind he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he unmerciful and unconſcionable, in ſeeking to encreaſe his own wealth, by ſuch means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyſoned with envy, troubled both himſelf, and the whole City, whilſt he lived. His mean birth cauſed him to hate the Nobility: eſpecially thoſe that were in chief eſtimation. Neither did he ſpare to bite at ſuch as were of his own rank, Men raiſed by deſert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whoſe Lieutenant he had been at Thermopylæ, was his Competitor for the Cenſorſhip, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath againſt him, which was counted as no bettter than malicious perjury, That he had not brought into the common Treaſury ſome Veſſels of Gold and Silver, gotten in the Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's grew partly (beſides his general ſpight at the Nobility) from his own firſt riſing, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from ſome check, that was given unto himſelf, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whoſe Treaſurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his diſlike of the Conſuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in ſome peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of ſuch double diligence in his Treaſurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he publiſhed, or for want of judgment thinking unworthily of the vertue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue reports againſt his General; whoſe noble deeds confuted ſufficiently the Author of ſuch falſe tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilſt it was nouriſhed by their Enemy, brake out upon advantage, eſpecially againſt L. Scipio, his Brother being dead, or out of the way. A ſevere inquiry and judgment being appointed of purpoſe againſt Scipio, matters were ſo carried, that he was ſoon condemned in a ſum of Money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his his body ſhould have been layed up in Priſon: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the ſame Tribune who had cauſed the ſuit againſt the African to be let fall. In his eſtate, which was confiſcated to the uſe of the City, when there neither appeared any ſign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found ſo much as what he had been condemned to pay; then fell his accuſers, and all whoſe hands had been againſt him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred friends, and clients made ſuch a collection for him, as would have ſet him in better eſtate than before, if he had accepted it. He took no more than ſuch of his own goods, as were of neceſſary uſe, being redeemed for him by his neareſt friends.

And thus began the civil War of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable, until now, ſince the Punick War. Security of danger from abroad, and ſome want of ſufficient employment, were eſpecial helps to the kindling of this fire; which firſt caught hold upon that great Worthy, to whoſe vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into ſo great ſecurity her extream danger. But theſe factious contentions did no long while contain themſelves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in ſuch quarrelſome buſineſs, grew to perfection, they that found themſelves over-matched by their adverſaries, at this kind of Weapon, began to make oppoſition, firſt with Clubs and Stones, afterward with Swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the Streets, unto Battel in the open Field. Cornelia, Daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two Sons was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, ſaw thoſe her two Sons, whilſt they were but young, ſlaughtered in Rome together with ſome of their friends, by thoſe whom they oppoſed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At theſe times the Senators began to take upon them authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Conſuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Conſuls provide, that the Commonweal receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen Enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular Man, whom by ſuch authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captain of theirs, was ſo condemned, who by force of Arms returned into the City, and murdered all the principal Senators: whereupon began the civil Wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himſelf abſolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæſar, a Man of higher ſpirit, to affect and obtain the like Sovereign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was provoked. It is true, that never any Conſul had finally cauſe to rejoyce, of his having put in execution ſuch authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in paſſing their Laws, by hurling of Stones, and other violence, made the City ſtand in need of a Sovereign Lord: ſo the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as Enemies thoſe that would not ſubmit themſelves, when they were over-topped by voices in the Houſe, did compel Cæſar, or give him at leaſt pretence, to right himſelf by Arms: wherewith prevailing againſt his adverſaries, he took ſuch order, that neither Senate, nor People, ſhould thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by inteſtine diſcord, the Romans conſuming all or moſt of their principal Citizens, loſt their own freedom, and became Subjects unto the arbitrary Government of One: ſuffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their inſolent rule, wherein they took upon them as the higheſt Lords on Earth, to do even what they liſted. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat greatneſs, nor believed of her ſelf as if ſhe had, whilſt a King ſate Crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this conſummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the ſequel will diſcover.

The ſecond Macedonian War.

§. I.

The Condition wherein thoſe Princes and Eſtates remained, which were aſſociates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finiſhed. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal inſolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for War, abtains Peace at Rome, by his Son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

AFter the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweal of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the ſame Laws and Magiſtrates, as they formerly had been, before the arrival of the Romans in thoſe parts: yet in very truth (the publick declaration excepted) they were none other than abſolute Vaſſals to the People of Rome. For of thoſe five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Sovereign power, in whom ſoever it reſt; namely, To make Laws, To create Magiſtrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, To beat Mome; and To reſerve (as the French call it) le der- mier reſort, or the laſt Appeals, the Romans had aſſumed four; and the greateſt of them ſo abſolutely, that is, The Appeal, or laſt reſort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embaſſadors, or Commiſſioners, in thoſe places whence the Complaint came or otherwiſe by the Senators themſelves within Rome: from whoſe arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Commweals, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Eſtates and Regalities utterly diſſolved. Nevertheleſs it is true, that they had their own Laws, and Officers of their own ordaining: yet ſo, as neither their Laws were of force, when the Romans interpoſed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Maſtrates ſo free, as that they had not therein eſpecial regard unto the good pleaſure of theſe their Maſters.

And to ſuch degree of ſervitude the ſeveral Eſtates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankful for their deliverance from a yoke more ſenſibly grievous; or, as being skilful in the art of flattery, and therein taking delight, ſince therein conſiſted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of diſpleaſing the ſtrongeſt, than mindful of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being moſt obſequious unto the Romans, was not, of long time, queſtioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of War and Peace, together with the diverſion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to uſe his own even as he liſted, until they ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdom bordered upon the Nations, by them not throughly ſubdued. For upon the ſame reaſon (as well as upon his own high deſerts) were they very loving unto Maſaniſſa, and to his Houſe, until Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion ſetled in Africk: as likewiſe afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding People in ſubjection unto themſelves, by the Miniſtry of Kings: eſpecially of ſuch Kings, as were uſeful and obſequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and ſhewed himſelf not forgetful of his own former greatneſs, the honour of his Race, or the high reputation of his Kingdom. But ſuch magnanimity was none otherwiſe conſtrued by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Eſtate, and a valuation of himſelf againſt them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithſtanding that he had lately given paſſage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the ways for them, and furniſhed them both with Victuals, and other things needful, to tranſport them over the Helleſpont into Aſia, againſt Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Theſſaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his Neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, even from the Romans themſelves.

Theſe Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lyſimachus his Kingdom: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northweſt, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to have made himſelf Lord of Tranſylvania: in which Province it is ſaid, * That innumerable Medals of Gold have been found, in the age of our Grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and ſtamped with his Image on the one ſide, on the other ſide with Victory. Of all theſe Lordſhips, the poſſeſſion, or rather the title (for he lived not to ſettle his Eſtate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of War, wherein he vanquiſhed and ſlue Lyſimachus: as alſo, by the like right, Ptolemy Ceraunus thought them his own, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdom of Macedon could not ſuſtain, did ſhortly and eaſily waſh away from that Crown, together with the more part of Thrace, all thoſe heaps of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the Son of Demetrius, and his Succeſſors: though not much; for they were otherwiſe buſied. The fury of the Gaules being over-paſt, thoſe Countries which lately had been oppreſſed by them, recovered their liberty; and not only held it, but learned, ſome of them, eſpecially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to find their advantages, and make uſe of them, even upon Macedon. Againſt the miſchiefs commonly done by theſe, King Philip did provide the moſt convenient remedies: by ſhutting up the ways, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdom; and by occupying Lyſimachia, with ſome other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Country, againſt the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own Eſtate: yet foraſmuch as theſe Towns were, in a manner, at abſolute liberty, his poſſeſſion of them was thought to partake more of violence than of juſtice. And in this reſpect he was formerly accuſed by the Ætolians, of wrongful uſurpation and oppreſſion, in his having occupied Lyſimachia. Hereto he made a good anſwer, That his Garriſon did only ſave it from the Thracians: who, as ſoon as he thence withdrew his Men, did ſeize upon the Town, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have ſaid, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were Places unable to defend themſelves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdom. But this Plea had not availed him, in the diſputation about Lyſimachia: and in the preſent queſtion, the Romans were not without their own title; ſince Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilſt Philip was buſied in his former War; and ſince they, by their victory had gotten unto themſelves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only ſubmitted his right unto the good pleaſure of the Senate: referring it unto their diſpoſition, Whether Ænus and Maronea ſhould be ſet at liberty, whether left in his hand, or whether beſtowed upon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lyſimachia and Cherſoneſus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might eaſily perceive, by the demeanor of their Embaſſadors towards him: who ſitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave ſentence againſt him in every Controverſy. Nevertheleſs, he ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, there to maintain his right unto theſe Towns, wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his ſide. For he had holpen their Conſuls in the War againſt Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatſoever he had gotten for himſelf, was now taken from him by their Embaſſadors: and would they now deprive him of thoſe two Towns, lying ſo fitly for the guard of his Kingdom, which he had gotten to himſelf out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruines Antiochus had gotten in thoſe quarters a great deal more? By ſuch allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at leaſtwiſe wiſe to gain time, wherein he might bethink himſelf what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him than had been their Embaſſadors. Wherefore, conſidering how inſolently the Maronites had behaved themſelves, in pleading againſt him for their liberty, he took counſel of his own Paſſions; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gave order to Onomaſtus, that was Warden of the Sea-coaſts, to handle theſe Maronites in ſuch ſort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them ſo earneſtly deſired. Onomaſtus employed Caſſander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might ſack the Town, and uſe all cruelties of War. This was done, but ſo ill taken by the Roman Embaſſadors, who had better notice, than could have been feared of theſe Proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more ſtrictly, than became his Majeſty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himſelf, and laid it even upon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being ſome inclinable to him, other ſome to Eumenes, had fallen into ſuch an outrage, that they had cut one anothers Throats. And hereof he willed the Embaſſadors to inquire, among the Maronites themſelves: as well knowing, that they who ſurvived were either his own Friends; or ſo terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durſt not utter an offenſive word. But he found the Romans more ſevere and more throughly informed in the buſineſs, than to reſt contented with ſuch an anſwer. He was plainly told, that if he would diſcharge himſelf of the Crime objected; he muſt ſend Onomaſtus and Caſſander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate ſhould think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his Spirits, and ſaid that Caſſander ſhould be at their diſpoſition: but concerning Onomaſtus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requeſted them not to preſs him; ſince it ſtood not with his honour, ſo lightly to give away his Friends. As for Caſſander, becauſe he ſhould tell no Tales; he took order to have him poyſoned by the way. By this we ſee, That the Doctrine, which Machiavel taught unto Cæſar Borgia, To employ men in miſchievous Actions, and afterwards to deſtroy them when they have performed the Miſchief; was not of his own invention. All Ages have given us Examples of this goodly Pollicy, the latter having been apt Scholars in this Leſſon to the more ancient: as the Reign of Henry the Eighth here in England, can bear good witneſs; and therein eſpecially the Lord Cromwell, who periſhed by the ſame unjuſt Law that himſelf had deviſed, for the taking away of another mans life, Such actions of Philip made an unpleaſant noiſe at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the War which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger Son Demetrius as Embaſſador unto the Senate: giving him inſtructions, how to make anſwer to all complaints; and withal to deliver his own grievances, in ſuch wiſe that if ought were amiſs, yet might it appear that he had been ſtrongly urged to take ſuch courſes. The Sum of his Embaſſage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the preſent. Demetrius himſelf was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate; as having been well approved by them, when he was Hoſtage in Rome: and therefore ſeemed the more likely to prevail ſomewhat; were it only in regard that would be born unto his Perſon.

Whilſt this buſineſs with the Macedonian hung in ſuſpence, and whilſt he, by his readineſs to make ſubmiſſion, ſeemed likely to divert from himſelf ſome other way the Roman Arms: the ſame Embaſſadors, that had been Judges between him and his Neighbours, made their Progreſs through the reſt of Greece; and took notice of the controverſies, which they found between ſome Eſtates in the Country. The greateſt cauſe that was heard before them, was the complaint of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians againſt the Achæans. It was objected unto the Achæans, That they had committed a grievous ſlaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the Walls of the City: as alſo further, in changing the Laws, and abrogating the famous Inſtitutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achæans, made anſwer, That theſe baniſhed Lacedæmonians, who now took upon them to accuſe the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriouſly known to be the men, who had themſelves committed that murder, whereof ſhameleſly they laid the blame upon others: the Achæans having only called thoſe unto judgment, that were ſuppoſed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion againſt both them and the Romans; and theſe Plaintiffs having ſlain them, upon private, though juſt hatred, as they were coming to make anſwer for themſelves. Concerning their throwing down the Walls of Lacedæmon, he ſaid it was moſt agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, having perſwaded his Citizens to defend their Town and liberty by their proper Vertue, did inhibite unto them all kinds of Fortifications; as the Retreats and Neſts either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had woful experience) of Tyrants and Uſurpers. Further he ſhewed, how the ſame Tyrants that had built theſe Walls, and hemmed in the Spartans, had alſo quite aboliſhed Lycurgus his Ordinances, and governed the City by their own lawleſs Will. As for the Achæans, they communicated their own Laws, which they held for the beſt, or elſe would ſoon change them and take better, unto the Lacedæmonians: whom they found without Laws, or any tolerable form of Policy. For concluſion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embaſſadors, That he and his Countrymen held it ſtrange, being Friends and faithful Allies of the Romans, to ſee themſelves thus conſtrained, to anſwer and give account of their actions, as Vaſſals and Slaves unto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at liberty: why might not the Achæans as well require to be ſatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did buſie themſelves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would ſtand upon their greatneſs, and intimate, as they began, that the liberty of their Friends was nothing worth, longer than ſhould pleaſe themſelves to ratifie it: then muſt the Achæans have recourſe unto thoſe Agreements, that were confirmed by Oath, and which without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more the Immortal Gods. To this bold anſwer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking State upon him, he pronounced more like a Maſter than a Judge, That if the Achæans would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilſt they might; they ſhould be compelled with a miſchief chief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Achæans; which groaned to hear the Lordly Words of Appius. Yet Fear prevailed above Indignation: and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soon after, did make void all Judgments of death or Banishment, that had been laid by the Achæans upon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a Member of the Achæan Commonwealth; or taken from them, and made, as it had been, an Estate by it self. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Council of Achaia, they discovered no less, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaians, than the Power which they had over them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-weals whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good Counsel and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by seeking Patronage, made meer Vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policy so prevail with them, but their private Passions, and neighbouring Hatred, which hath evermore bought Revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the Honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearful Servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very far from daring to stir against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his Subjection had made his implacable Enemies) in hearty affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take Arms, as shortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired Ratification of Peace; though qualified with much indignity soon following. He had been lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of Objections, whereto his youth, unskilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted unto him, to read such brief Notes as he had received from his Father, and out of those, the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his own sake, as they then said and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodness in the defence. Such Pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreaty of his Son, together with some insolence of his Son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred unto Rome, and breed in him a jealousie of his too forward Son. To set him forward in these Passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome; some bringing one Commandment; some another; and some requiring him to fulfil those things, which had been imposed upon him by their Fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance; and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius, was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his Father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder Son of the King, should not succeed unto his Father; but that the Diadem should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended not only Perseus, but Philip himself: who suspected his younger Son, as more Roman than his own; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousie; it will not be amiss, to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

§. II.

The death of Philopœman, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military Profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some Examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrel in the Continent of Greece, had of late been so peremptory with the Achæans; that they seemed not unlikely to take part against them, in any Controversie that should be moved. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achæan Common-wealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up again an Estate of their own, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerful in their City: who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpose, and not over strongly affected in the business, were careful to seek occasion of reducing things to such pass, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to do some Acts of Hostility: whereby it was probable that Blood should be drawn, and either side so far exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their Commotion and Proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, levyed such Forces as he could in hafte, and went against them. Many Principal Gentlemen of the Achæans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readiness to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Messenians; whom he charged and forced to run. But whilst his Horsemen were too earnest in following the Chace; there arrived by chance, a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new Courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again; and with the help of those, who very seasonably came to their aid, compelled Philipœmens Horsemen to turn back. Philopœmen himself had long been sick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatness of his Courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safe-ſafety, which had ſo willingly adventured themſelves under his Conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreat: and ſuffering his Horſemen to paſs along by him in a narrow Lane, he often turned about againſt the Meſſenians; whom his Reputation, and the knowledge of his great Worth, did terrifie from approaching over-near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being caſt to the Ground by a fall of his Horſe, and being withal in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet ſcarce believed their Fortune to be ſo good, although their Eyes were Witneſſes. The firſt Meſſenger that brought this News to Meſſene, was ſo far from being believed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right Wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the Spectacle ſeeming ſo incredible. They cauſed him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might ſatisfie themſelves with beholding him. The greateſt part of them had compaſſion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his Vertue, and of the ſingular Benefits by him done unto them, eſpecially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifeſt their good Will for his delivery. Contrariwiſe, Dinocrates and his Faction were deſirous haſtily to take away his life: becauſe they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any diſgrace or injury done to him unrevenged. They durſt not one truſt another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a ſtrong Vault under ground, that had been made for the cuſtody of their Treaſure. So thither they let him down faſt bound, and with an Engine laid an heavy Stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not ſtayed long, ere his Enemies had concluded his preſent Death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him, with a Cup of Poyſon, which Philopœmen took in his Hand: and asking no more than whether the Horſemen were eſcaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was ſafe; when he heard an anſwer to his mind, he ſaid it was well: and ſo with a chearful countenance, drank his laſt Draught. He was ſeventy years old, and weakned with long ſickneſs, whereby the Poyſon wrought the ſooner, and eaſily took away his Life. The Achæans, when they miſſed him in their Flight, were mervelloufly offended with themſelves, for that they had been more mindful to preſerve their own Lives, than to look unto the ſafety of ſo excellent a Commander. Whilſt they were deviſing what to do in ſuch a caſe: They got advertiſement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: So as Embaſſadors were forthwith diſpatched unto Meſſene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withal, to obtain it by force, in caſe that fair means would not ſerve. Lycortas was choſen General of the Army againſt Meſſene: who coming thither and laying ſiege to the Town, enforced it in ſhort ſpace to yield. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himſelf, and made an end of his own life. The reſt of thoſe that had been partakers in the Murder, were compelled to wait in Bonds upon the Aſhes of Philopœmen, that were carried home in ſolemn Pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all of them ſlain at his Funeral, as Sacrifices to his Ghoſt whom they had offended. Q. Martius a Roman Embaſſador, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occaſion or other, the Roman Embaſſadors were ſeldom abſent. He would have entermedled in this buſineſs of Meſſene, had not Lycortas made ſhort work, and left him nothing to do.

About the ſame time was T. Quintius Flaminius ſent Embaſſador to Pruſias, King of Bithynia: not ſo much to withdraw him from proſecuting the War againſt Eumenes, as to intreat him, that he would deliver Hannibal, the moſt ſpightful Enemy in all the World unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Pruſias (therein unworthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condeſcend: or rather (as Livy thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the firſt conference between the King and Flaminius, a Troop of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cauſe before this, to ſuſpect the Faith of Pruſias, had deviſed ſome ſecret ſallies under ground, to ſave himſelf from any treaſonable and ſudden aſſault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-cloſed, he had recourſe to his laſt remedy: which he then was conſtrained to practiſe, as well to fruſtrate his Enemies of their triumphing over him, as to ſave himſelf from their torture and mercileſs hands; who, as he well knew, would neither reſpect his famous Enterpriſes, his Honour, nor his Age. When therefore he ſaw no way of eſcape, nor counſel to reſort unto, he took the poyſon into his hand, which he always preſerved for a ſure Antidote againſt the ſharpeſt Diſeaſes of adverſe Fortune; which being ready to ſwallow down, he uttered theſe words: I will now (ſaid he) deliver the Romans of that fear, which hath ſo many years poſſeſt them; that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This Victory of Flaminius over me, which am diſarmed, and betrayed into his hands, ſhall never be numbred among the reſt of his heroical deeds: No, it ſhall make it manifeſt to all the Nations of the World, how far the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For ſuch was the nobleneſs of their fore-fathers; as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them Battel at their own doors, they gave him knowledg of the Treaſon intended againſt him by poyſon: Whereas theſe of a latter Race have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore been one of their Conſuls, to practiſe with Pruſias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Laws of Hoſpitality, to ſlaughter or deliver up his own Gueſt. He then curſing the perſon of Pruſias, and all his, and deſiring the Immortal Gods to revenge his infidelity, drank off the poyſon, and died.

In this year alſo (as good Authors have reported) to accompany Philopœmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: theſe being, all of them, as great Captains as ever the World had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whoſe Tragedy we have now finiſhed, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded ſuch ſupplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was ſo ſtrongly croſt by a cowardly and envious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publick force to ſuſtain it, did laſtly diſſolve it ſelf in his own, and in the common miſery of his Country and Commonweal.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the Envy of our Equals, and jealouſie of our Maſters, be they Kings, or Commonweals, That there is no Profeſſion more unp oſperous, than that of Men of War, and great Captains, being no Kings. For beſides the Envy and Jealouſie of Men; the Spoils,

Rapes,

Rapes, Famine, Slaughter of the innocent, vaſtation, and burnings, with a world of miſeries laid on the labouring man, are ſo hateful to God, as with good reaſon did Monluc, the Marſhal of France, confeſs, That were not the mercies of GOD infinite, and without reſtriction, it were in vain for thoſe of his profeſſion to hope for any portion of them: ſeeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were alſo infinite. Howſoever, this is true, That the Victories, which are obtained by many of the greateſt Commanders, are commonly either aſcribed to thoſe that ſerve under them, to Fortune, or to the cowardiſe of the Nation againſt whom they ſerve. For the moſt of others, whoſe Vertues have raiſed them above the level of their inferiors, and have ſurmounted their Envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with diſgrace, baniſhment, or death. Among the Romans we find many Examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Æmylius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read of not many, that eſcaped theſe rewards. Yea long before theſe times, it was a Legacy that David bequeathed unto his victorious Captain Joab. With this fare Alexander feaſted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Caſſander. Hereto Valentinian, the Emperor, invited Ætius: who, after many other Victories, overthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greateſt battel, for the well fighting and reſolution of both Armies, that ever was ſtrucken in the world; for there fell of thoſe that fought, beſides run-aways, an hundred and fourſcore thouſand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperor, by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whoſe perſwaſion Valentinian ſlew Ætius) murdered the Emperor, which he never durſt attempt, Ætius living. And, beſides the loſs of that Emperor, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Weſtern Empire was rather diſſolved, than obſcured. The ſame unworthy deſtiny, or a far worſe, had Belliſarius; whoſe undertakings and victories were ſo difficult and glorious, as after-ages ſuſpected them for fabulous. For he had his Eyes torn out of his head by Juſtinian: and he died a blind beggar. Narſes alſo, to the great prejudice of Chriſtian Religion, was diſgrac'd by Juſtin. That Rule of Cato againſt Scipio, hath been well obſerved in every Age ſince then, to wit, That the Common-weal cannot be accounted free, which ſtandeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turks drawn another Principle, and indeed a Turkiſh one, That every Warlike Prince, ſhould rather deſtroy his greateſt men of War, than ſuffer his one Glory to be obſcured by them. For this cauſe did Bajaret the ſecond diſpatch Baſſa Acomat; Selim ſtrangle Baſſa Muſtapha; and moſt of thoſe Princes, bring to ruine the moſt of their Viſiers. Of the Spaniſh Nation, the great Gunſalvo, who drave the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Corteſe, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with Nettles, not with Lawrel. The Earls of Egmont and Horn, had no Heads left them to were Garlands on. And that the great Captains of all Nations, have been paid with this Copper Coyn; there are Examples more than too many. On the contrary it may be ſaid, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings and Emperors, by their great Ability in matter of War. This I confeſs. Yet muſt it be had withal in conſideration, that theſe high Places have been given or offered unto very few, as Rewards of their Military Vertue; though many have uſurped them, by the help and favour of thoſe Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppreſſed the liberty of Free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperors, which have traiterouſly caſt down their Maſters, and ſtepped up into their Seats; were not all of them good men of War: but have uſed the advantage of ſome Commotion, or many of them, by baſe and cowardly Practiſes, have obtained thoſe Dignities, which undeſervedly were aſcribed to their perſonal Worth. So that the number of thoſe, that have purchaſed abſolute Greatneſs by the greatneſs of their Warlike Vertue; is far more in ſeeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by help of the Souldiers, he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a Coward; and with a barbarous Cruelty, ſeldom found in any other than Cowards, he ſlew firſt the Children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his Face, and after them Mauritius himſelf. This his bloody aſpiring was but as a Debt, which was paid unto him again by Heraclius: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjuſtly gotten; and ſet it on his own Head. Leontius laid hold on the Emperor Juſtine, cut off his Noſe and Ears, and ſent him into Baniſhment: But Gods Vengeance rewarded him with the ſame Puniſhment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whoſe charge he had left his own men of War. Juſtine, having recovered Forces, lighted on Tiberius; and barbed him after the ſame faſhion. Philippicus, commanding the Forces of Juſtine, murdered both the Emperor and his Son. Anaſtaſius, the Vaſſal of this new Tyrant, ſurpriſed his Maſter Philippicus, and thruſt out both his Eyes. But with Anaſtaſius, Theodoſius dealt more gently: for having wreſted the Scepter out of his Hands, he enforced him to become a Prieſt. It were an endleſs, and a needleſs work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodoſius; how many others have been repayed with their own Cruelty, by men alike Ambitious and Cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thouſands, hoping of Captains to make themſelves Kings, have by GODS juſtice miſerably periſhed in the Attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the beſt way of thriving by the practice of Arms, is to take what may be gotten by the Spoil of Enemies, and the Liberality of thoſe Princes and Cities, in whoſe Service one hath well deſerved. But ſcarce one of a thouſand have proſpered by this Courſe. For that obſervation, made by Solomon, of unthankfulneſs in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City and few men in it, and a great King came againſt it, and compaſſed it about, and builded Forts againſt it: And there was found a poor and wiſe man therein, and he delivered the City by his wiſdom: but none remembred this poor man. Eccleſ. c. 9. 14, & 15. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great Thanks, leaſt thereby they ſhould acknowledge themſelves to have been indebted for great Benefits: which the unwiſer ſort of them think to favour of ſome impotency in themſelves. But in this reſpect they are oftentimes couſened and abuſed: which proves that weakneſs to be in them indeed, whereof they ſo gladly ſhun the opinion. Contrariwiſe, Free Eſtates are bountiful in giving thanks; yet ſo, as thoſe thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captains have made, by enriching themſelves with the Spoil of the Enemy, they are very inquiſitive to ſearch into it, and to ſtrip the well-deſervers out of their Gettings: yea moſt injuriouſly to rob them of their own, upon a falſe ſuppoſition: that even they whoſe hands are moſt clean from ſuch offences offences, have purloyned ſomewhat from the common Treaſury. Hereof I need not to produce Examples: that of the two Scipio's being ſo lately recited.

In my late Sovereigns time, although for the Wars, which for her own ſafety ſhe was conſtrained to undertake, her Majeſty had no leſs cauſe to uſe the ſervice of Martial Men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predeceſſors for many years had, yet according to the deſtiny of that Profeſſion, I do not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldeſt and moſt proſperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwiſe honoured, for any ſervice by them performed. And that her Majeſty had many adviſed, valiant, and faithful Men, the proſperity of her Affairs did well witneſs, who in all her Days never received diſhonour, by the Cowardiſe or Infidelity of any Commander, by her ſelf choſen and imployed.

For as all her old Captains by Land, died poor Men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewry, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunſtable, Bourchier, Barkley, Bingham, and others: ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous employment, whereof Norice and Vere were the moſt famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did: thoſe (I ſay) with many other brave Collonels, have left behind them (beſides the Reputation which they purchaſed with many Travels and Wounds) nor Title nor Eſtate to their Poſterity. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the World their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Majeſty in the advancement of her Men of War, did ſooner believe other Men than her ſelf, a Diſeaſe unto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelf, have been ſubject: I ſay that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeem altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakneſs. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the proſperous Actions are ſo exceedingly prized, the Actors are ſo unproſperous and ſo generally neglected. The cauſe, I ſay, which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that thoſe which are neareſt the Perſon of Princes (which Martial Men ſeldom are) can with no good Grace commend, or at leaſt magnifie a Profeſſion far more Noble than their own, ſeeing therein they ſhould only mind their Maſters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving leſs Honour and Reward to Men of far greater deſerving, and of far greater uſe than themſelves.

But His Majeſty hath already paid the greateſt part of that Debt. For beſides the relieving by Pentions all the poorer ſort, he hath honoured more Martial Men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred years.

He hath given a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkable Service, as well in the year 1588. as at Caliz., the Iſlands, and in our own Seas; having firſt commanded as a Captain, twice Admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in chief. His Majeſty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldoms, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Ruſſel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons, for their Governments and Services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elſewhere.

§. III.

Philip making Proviſion for War againſt the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own Subjects. His Negotiation with the Baſtarnæ. His Cruelty. He ſuſpecteth his Son Demetrius. Demetrius accuſed by his Brother Perſeus; and ſhortly after ſlain, by his Fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his Sons death; whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perſeus, he dieth.

Quintius Martius the Roman Embaſſador, who travelled up and down, ſeeking what work might be found about Greece, had received inſtruction from the Senate, to uſe the moſt of his diligence in looking into the Eſtate of Macedon. At his return home, that he might not ſeem to have diſcovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatſoever they enjoyned him; yet ſo, as it might appear, that ſuch his obedience would laſt no longer, than meer neceſſity ſhould enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and ſayings of that King did wholly tend unto Rebellion, about which he was deviſing. Now it was ſo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obſequiouſneſs to the Romans, and foreſaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdom into their own hands, with ſafety of their honour, if they could find convenient means; or otherwiſe (as to him ſeemed apparent) by what means ſoever. He was in an ill caſe: as having been already vanquiſhed by them; having loſt exceedingly both in Strength and Reputation; having Subjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither Neighbour nor Friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could deviſe againſt the neceſſity which he daily feared. Such of his own People as dwelt in the Maritime Towns, and gave him cauſe to ſuſpect that they would do but bad Service againſt the Romans, he compelled to forſake their Dwellings, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence theſe were tranſplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whoſe Faith he thought a great deal more aſſured, againſt thoſe Enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he deviſed upon alluring the Baſtarnæ, a ſtrong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the River of Danubius, to abandon their Seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, beſides other great Rewards, would help them to root out the Dardanians, and take poſſeſſion of their Countrey. Theſe were like to do him notable ſervice againſt the Romans: being not only ſtout fighting men; but ſuch, as being planted in thoſe Quarters by him, would bear reſpect unto him alone. The leaſt benefit that could be hoped by their Arrival, muſt be the utter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People always troubleſom to the Kingdom of Macedon, whenſoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter to perſwade thoſe Baſtarnæ, by hope of Spoil, and other incitements, unto a more deſperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriatick Sea, into Italy it ſelf. It was not known who ſhould withſtand them upon the way: Rather it was thought that the Scordiſci, and peradventure ſome others, through whoſe Countries they were to paſs, would accompany them againſt the Romans, were it only in hope of Spoil. Now to facilitate the remove of theſe Baſtarnæ from their own Habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the Border of Macedon; a long and tedious Journey unto them, that carried with them their Wives and Children: Philip with gifts did purchaſe the good will of ſome Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paſs. And thus he ſought means to ſtrengthen himſelf, with help of the wild Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; ſince he was not like to find aſſiſtance from any civil Nation, about the whole compaſs of the Mediterranean Seas. But theſe devices were long ere they took effect: ſo as the Baſtarnæ came not before ſuch time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpoſe. In the mean time he neglected not the trayning of his Men to War, and the exerciſe of them in ſome ſmall Expeditions, againſt thoſe wild People that bordered upon him, and ſtood worſt affected toward him.

But theſe his Counſels and Proceedings were miſerably diſturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own Houſe. The Families and whole Townſhips, which he had cauſed much againſt their wills to forſake their ancient dwellings, and betake themſelves to ſuch new habitations, as he in his diſcretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at firſt contained it ſelf within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwiſe than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which alſo he did unwillingly, being himſelf over-ruled by neceſſity, that ſeemed apparent. This evil therefore would ſoon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindicative nature made it worſe. He could not pardon words proceeding from juſt ſorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly ſought revenge where it was needleſs. In his rage he cauſed many to die: among whom were ſome eminent Men; and few or none of them deſervedly. This encreaſed the hatred of the People, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curſes. Which grew the more general; when the King in a barbarous and baſe fury, miſtruſting all alike whom he had injured, thought himſelf unlike to be ſafe, until he ſhould have maſſacred all the Children of thoſe Parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleaſure, ſome accidents, more tragical than perhaps he could have deſired, gave Men cauſe to think (as they could not in reaſon think otherwiſe) that, not without vengeance poured on him from Heaven, he felt the like miſery in his own Children. It is hard to ſay what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they ſhewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger Son. It may well be (though it may be alſo ſuſpected) that they had no purpoſe to make and nouriſh diſſention between the Brethren, but only to cheriſh the vertue and towardlineſs of Demetrius: like as we find it in their Hiſtories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual reſpect of them, bred extream jealouſie in the Fathers head. If any cuſtom of the Romans, the manner of their life, the faſhion of their apparel, or the unſightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jeſted at in ordinary diſcourſe and Table-talk, Demetrius was ſure to be preſently on fire, defending and praiſing them, even in ſuch points as rather needed excuſe. This, and his daily converſation with their Embaſſadors, as often as they came, gave his Father cauſe to think, that he was no fit partaker of any counſel held againſt them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder Son Perſeus: who fearing ſo much leſt his Brother ſhould ſtep between him and the ſucceſſion, converted wholly, unto his deſtruction, that grace which he had with his Father. Perſeus was then thirty years old; of a ſtirring ſpirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices, than his free ſpeeches diſcovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained ſuch ſuſpitions, that were much encreaſed by the cunning practice of his elder Son, a ſlight occaſion made the fire break out, that had long lain ſmothered. A Muſter, and ceremonious luſtration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great ſolemnity. The manner of it at the preſent was thus. They cleft in twain a Bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Army was to paſs. This done, the Arms of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very firſt original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two Sons: after him came his own band, and they of his guard; whom all the reſt of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Army was divided into two parts: which, under the Kings two Sons, charged each other in manner of a true fight, uſing Poles, and the like, in ſtead of their Pikes and accuſtomed Weapous. But in this preſent skirmiſh there appeared ſome extraordinary contention for the Victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over-earneſtly ſeek each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good ſucceſs in a greater trial. Some ſmall hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with thoſe ſtakes, until Perſeus his ſide at length recoiled. Perſeus himſelf was ſorry for this, as it had been ſome bad preſage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good uſe. They were of the craftier ſort: who perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courſes of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addreſſed their ſervices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they ſaid, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint againſt him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that ſolemn paſtime. Each of the Brethren was that day to feaſt his own companions, and each of them had ſpies in the others lodging, to obſerve what was ſaid and done. One of Perſeus his Intelligencers behaved himſelf ſo indiſcreetly, that he was taken and well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his Men, who turned him out of doors. After ſome ſtore of Wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go viſit his Brother, and ſee what chear he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting ſuch of them as had ill handled his Brothers Man: yet he would leave none of his train behind, but forced them alſo to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themſelves ſecretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there ſuch good eſpial kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made known to Perſeus: who thereupon tumultuouſly locked up his doors, as if he ſtood in fear to be aſſaulted in his Houſe. Demetrius wondered to ſee himſelf excluded, and fared very angerly with his Brother. But Perſeus, bidding him be gone as an Enemy, and one whoſe murderous purpoſe was detected, ſent him away with entertainment, no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder Brother accuſed the younger unto the Father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the ſame that hath been here recited, ſave that by miſconſtruction all was made worſe. But the main point of the accuſation, and which did aggravate all the reſt, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps alſo dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he ſhould be defended and born out. For Perſeus made ſhew, as if the Romans did hate him; becauſe he bore a due reſpect unto his Father, and was ſorry to ſee him ſpoiled, and daily robbed of ſomewhat by them. And for this cauſe he ſaid it was, that they did animate his Brother againſt him: as alſo that they ſought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a Letter, ſent of late from T. Quintius to the King himſelf: whereof the contents were, That he had done wiſely in ſending Demetrius to Rome; and that he ſhould yet further do well to ſend him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honorable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this Council was given by Titus, of purpoſe to ſhake the allegeance of thoſe, that ſhould wait upon his Brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become Servants to this young Traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anſwer, by rehearſing all paſſages of the day and night foregoing, in ſuch manner as he remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perſeus, that converted matters of Paſtime, and what was done or ſpoken in Wine, to ſuch an accuſation, whereby he ſought his innocent Brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bare him; He ſaid that it grew, if not from his own vertue, at leaſtwiſe from their Opinion thereof: ſo as by any impious practice, He were more like to loſe it wholly, than to encreaſe it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not ſuch paſſions, as are incident to Fathers, Children, and Brethren; beſides thoſe that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a Father, though a jealous Father, That he would conclude nothing upon the exceſs or Error, whatſoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better obſervation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themſelves both in word and deed. And herein he may ſeem to have dealt both juſtly and compaſſionately. But from this time forward, he gave himſelf over wholly to Perſeus: uſing ſo little conference with his younger Son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, ſuch eſpecially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to have him preſent, nor near unto him. Above all, he had eſpecial care to learn out what had paſſed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; Men whom he thought no way intereſſed in the quarrels between the Brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they ſaw the more in grace. Theſe brought home with them a Letter, ſaid to be written by Titus (whoſe Seal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The Contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious deſires had cauſed him to enter into practices unjuſtifiable, againſt his elder Brother; which yet ſhould never take effect, for that Titus himſelf would not be Author, or abbettor, of any impious device. This manner of excuſe did forcibly perſwade the King, to think his Son a dangerous Traitor. To ſtrengthen him in this Opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in cuſtody, made ſhew as if he had pitied the Eſtate of the unhappy Prince; and ſo wrung out of him his ſecert intentions, which he ſhortly diſcovered unto Philip. It was the purpoſe of Demetrius to fly ſecretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in ſafety, from his Father and Brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could find at home, of bettering ſuch claim as he had in reverſion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatſoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falſhood of Didas: who playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the eſcape, and in the mean while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip reſolved to put his Son to Death, without further expence of time. It was thought behoveful to make him away privily, for fear leſt the Romans ſhould take the matter to heart, and held it as proof ſufficient at leaſt, of the Kings deſpight againſt them, if not of his meaning to renew the War. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accurſed Miniſter of his Kings unadviſed Sentence, firſt gave poyſon to Demetrius; which wrought neither ſo haſtily, nor ſo ſecretly, as was deſired. Hereupon he ſent a couple of Ruffians, to finiſh the Tragedy: who villainouſly accompliſhed their work by ſmothering that Prince, in whoſe life conſiſted the greateſt hope of Macedon.

Brother

In all the Race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own Blood. The Houſes of Lyſimachus and Caſſander fell either with themſelves, or even upon their Heels, by inteſtine diſcord and jealouſies, grounded on deſire of Sovereign rule, or fear of loſing it. By the like unnatural hatred, had almoſt been cut off the Lines of Ptolemy and of Seleucus: which though narrowly they eſcaped the danger, yet were their Kingdoms thereby grievouſly diſtempered. Contrariwiſe, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upſtart Family of the Kings of Pergamus had raiſed it ſelf to marvelous greatneſs, in very ſhort ſpace, from the condition of meer ſlavery: whereof a principal cauſe was, the Brotherly love maintained by them, with ſingular commendation of their Piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of theſe examples; but is ſaid to have propounded the laſt of them, to his own Children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reaſon ſo to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his Enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender foſterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cheriſhed him in his minority. But He was himſelf of an unmerciful nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perſwader unto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the ſatiating of his Blood-thirſty appetite he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both ſtrangers, and ſubjects of his own; did now procure vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded Him with a draught of his own Poyſon. After the death of his Son, He too late began to examine the Crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him ſatisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole proceſs. His only remaining Son Perſeus could ſo ill diſſemble the pleaſure which he took, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might eaſily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from ſome other cauſe, than the remove of thoſe dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leſs to be feared than at other times, when he, as having accompliſhed the moſt of his deſires, left off his uſual trouble of mind, and carefulneſs of making proviſion againſt them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by thoſe that well underſtood the difference, between a riſing and a ſetting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner deſolate: ſome expecting his death; and ſome ſcarce enduring the tedioufneſs of ſuch expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with ſuſpitious imaginations: the like whereof he had never been ſlow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and ſo much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable Man, a Couſen of his, named Antigonus, continued ſo true to Philip, that he grew thereby hateful to Perſeus: and thus becoming ſubject unto the ſame jealous impreſſions which troubled the King, became alſo partaker of his ſecrets. This Counſellor, when he found that the anger conceived againſt Perſeus would not vent it ſelf, and give eaſe to the King, until the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the Treaſon objected; as alſo that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embaſſadors which had brought from Rome that Epiſtle of Flaminius, that ſerved as the greateſt evidence againſt Demetrius) were ſuſpected of forgery in the buſineſs: made diligent inquiry after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xychus, a Man moſt likely to have underſtood what falſe dealing was uſed by thoſe Embaſſadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and preſented unto the King: ſaying, that this Fellow knew all, and muſt therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xychus for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before ſuſpected: confeſſing againſt himſelf, that he had been employed by the Embaſſadors in that wicked piece of buſineſs. No marvel, if the Fathers paſſions were extream, when he underſtood, that by the unnatural practice of one Son, he had ſo wretchedly caſt away another, far more vertuous, and innocent. He raged exceedingly againſt himſelf, and withal againſt the Authors of the miſchief. Upon the firſt news of this diſcovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy. Philocles was taken: and either foraſmuch as he could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yielded himſelf guilty, or elſe was put to torture. Perſeus was now grown ſtronger, than that he ſhould need to fly the Country: yet not ſo ſtout as to adventure himſelf into his Fathers preſence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdom, towards Thrace, whilſt his Father wintered at Demetrius. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious Son; took a reſolution, to aliene the Kingdom from him, and confer it upon Antigonus. But his weak Body, and exceſſive grief of mind, ſo diſabled him in the travel hereto belonging; that ere he could bring his purpoſe to effect, he was conſtrained to yield to nature: He had reigned about two and forty years: always full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himſelf, with continual Wars; of which that with the Romans was moſt unhappy, and few or none of the reſt found the concluſion, which a wiſe Prince would have deſired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befel him, he might thank his own perverſe condition: ſince his Uncle King Antigonus, had left unto him an eſtate, ſo great, and ſo well ſetled, as made it eaſie for him, to accompliſh any moderate deſires, if he had not abhorred all good counſel. Wherefore he was juſtly puniſhed; by feeling the difference between the imaginary happineſs of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilſt yet it was only drawing near, was foreſignified unto Perſeus, by Calligenes the Phyſician: who alſo concealed it awhile from thoſe that were about the Court. So Perſeus came thither on the ſudden, and took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom: which in fine he no leſs improvidently loſt, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Baſtarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perſeus in the beginning of his Reign. Some Wars of the Romans: and how they ſuffered Maſaniſſa, cruelly to oppreſs the Carthaginians. They quarrel with Perſeus. They allow not their Confederates to make War without their leave obtained. The Treaſon of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome than in former times. Further quarrels to Perſeus. He ſeeks friendſhip of the Achæans, and is withſtood by Callicrates. The Romans diſcover their intent of Warring upon him.

IMmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Baſtarnæ into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for their free paſſage, and for the indemnity of the Country. This compact was friendly obſerved, as long as none other was known than that Philip did live, to recompence all that ſhould be done, or ſuſtained, for his ſervice. But when it was heard, that a new King Reigned in Macedon; and not heard withal, that he took any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daſht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford ſo good Markets unto theſe ſtrangers, as formerly they had done. On the other ſide, the Baſtarnæ would not be contented with reaſon, but became their own carvers, Thus each part having loſt the rich hopes repoſed in Philip: grew careful of thriving in the preſent with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows: and the Baſtarnæ had the upper hand, ſo as they chaſed the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the victors made little uſe of their good fortune. For whether by reaſon of ſome overthrow, received by them in aſſaulting a place of ſtrength; or whether becauſe of extream bad weather, which is ſaid to have afflicted them as it were miraculouſly: all of them returned home, ſave thirty thouſand, which pierced on into Dardania. How theſe thirty thouſand ſped in their Voyage, I do not find. It ſeems that by the careleſs uſing of ſome victories, they drew loſs upon themſelves: and finally took that occaſion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perſeus he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his Reign, to embroyle himſelf in a War ſo dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his mind to the ſetling of his Eſtate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himſelf, as the condition of his affairs ſhould require, either for War or Peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion: he quickly took away the life of Antigonus. To win love of his People; he ſate perſonally to hear their cauſes in judgment (though herein herein he was ſo over-dilligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of Juſtice to be no better than fained: as alſo he gratified them with many delightful ſpectacles, magnificently by him ſet forth. Above all he had care to avoid all neceſſity of War with Rome: and therefore made it his firſt work, to ſend Embaſſadors thither, to renew the League; which he obtained, and was by the Senate ſaluted King and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in ſeeking to purchaſe good will of the Greeks, and other his Neighbours: but was rather herein ſo exceſſively bountiful, that it may ſeem a wonder, how in few years, to his utter ruine, be became ſo griping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the maſtring paſſion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into ſo many ſhapes, as made it hard to diſcern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requiſite no more, than the relation of his actions paſt and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, buſie in Wars againſt the Spaniards and Ligurians; People often vanquiſhed, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They alſo conquered Iſtria; ſubdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had ſome quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever ſince the Victory) a heavy hand; and ſuffered Maſaniſſa to take from them what he liſted. The Carthaginians, like obedient vaſſals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their own, to take Arms: from which they were bound by an Article of Peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Maſaniſſa therefore had great advantage over them: and was not ignorant how to uſe it. He could get poſſeſſion by force, of whatſoever he deſired, ere their complaining Embaſſadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leave things as they found them.

So had He once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and ſo did he uſe them again and again; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwiſe, without it. Gala the Father of Maſaniſſa had won ſome Land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wan from Gala, and within a while, reſtored to the right owners, for love of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Aſdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Maſaniſſa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whoſe judgment the caſe was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Eſtate, to uſe all manner of ſubmiſſive obedience to Rome. They had ſcarcely digeſted this injury, when Maſaniſſa came upon them again, and took from them above ſeventy Towns and Caſtles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaſſadors they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They ſhewed how grievouſly they were oppreſſed by reaſon of two Articles in their League: That they ſhould not make War, out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were ſo, that they might lawfully withſtand the violence of Maſaniſſa, invading their Country, howſoever he was pleaſed to call it his: yet ſince he was confederate with the Romans, they durſt not preſume to bear defenſive Arms againſt him, but ſuffered themſelves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might have fairer juſtice; or be ſuffered to defend their own by ſtrong hand; or at leaſt, if right muſt wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would be pleaſed to determine, how far forth Maſaniſſa ſhould be allowed, to proceed in theſe outrages. If none of theſe petitions could be obtained, then deſired they, that the Romans would let them underſtand, wherein they had offended ſince the time that Scipio gave them Peace; and vouchſafe to inflict on them ſuch puniſhment, as they themſelves in honour ſhould think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to ſuffer at once what ſhould be appointed by ſuch Judges; than continually to live in fear, and none otherwiſe draw breath than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithal the Embaſſadors threw themſelves proſtrate on the ground weeping in hope to move compaſſion. Here may we behold, the fruits of their envy to that valiant Houſe of the Barchines; of their irreſolution, in proſecuting a War ſo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfpenny-worthing, in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole Eſtate, in the purchaſe of a great Empire. Now are they Servants, even to the Servants of thoſe Men, whoſe Fathers they have often chaſed, ſlain, taken, and ſold as bondſlaves in the Streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africk and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman Peace, which Hanno ſo often and ſo earneſtly deſired. Only they want Peace with Maſaniſſa; once their Mercinary, and now their Maſter, or rather their Tormentor, out of whoſe cruel hands, they beſeech their Maſters to take the office of correcting them. In ſuch caſe are they, and adore the Romans, whom they ſee flouriſhing in ſuch proſperity as might have been their own. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who loſt the Battel at Cannæ; then Hannibal that wan it was uſed by the Carthaginians: they had freely beſtowed, every Man of them all his private riches, upon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompenſe: as alſo they had not thought it much, though being in extream want, to ſet out an Army into Spain, at what time the Enemy lay under their own Walls. Theſe were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought againſt their betters, muſt patiently endure the miſeries belonging to the vanquiſhed. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure ſome commiſeration, yet their tears may ſeem to have been miſtruſted, as proceeding no leſs from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themſelves able to fight with Maſaniſſa: which eſtimation of their forces was able to make them, after a while, enter into compariſons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no ſuch leave as they ſought, of defending their own right by Arms: but contrariwiſe, when without leave obtained they preſumed ſo far, the deſtruction of Carthage was thought an eaſie puniſhment of that offence. At the preſent, they received a gentle anſwer; though they had otherwiſe little amends. Guluſſa the Son of Maſaniſſa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reaſon of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians againſt his Father. He anſwered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embaſſadors thither ſent from Carthage, had therefore not given him inſtructions, how to deal in that buſineſs. Only it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Council divers nights, in the Temple of Æſculapius: whereupon he himſelf was diſpatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that theſe common Enemies of the Romans and and of his Father, might not be overmuch truſted; eſpecially againſt his Father, whom they hated moſt maliciouſly, for his conſtant faith to the People of Rome. This anſwer gave little ſatisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Maſaniſſa his ſake, they had done, and would do whatſoever was reaſonable; but that it ſtood not with their juſtice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians thoſe Lands, which by the Covenants of the League, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they diſmiſſed Guluſſa; beſtowing on him friendly preſents (as alſo they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his Father, that he ſhould do well to ſend Embaſſadors, more fully inſtructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian War was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unſeaſonably to rebellion) or Maſaniſſa, at whoſe hands they expected no little help. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Maſaniſſa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better uſage in the future; by Maſaniſſa, in way of thankfulneſs; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they ſhould be vanquiſhed; he made none other account, than that all Africk round about him and Carthage therewithal ſhould be his own.

In the midſt of all theſe cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perſeus. They viſited him daily with Embaſſadors: that is, with honourable ſpies to obſerve his behaviour. Theſe He entertained kindly at firſt, until (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their dilligence tended. Firſt they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any ſatisfaction, until the Baſtarnæ were thence gone; though he proteſted, that he had not ſent for them. Afterward they pryed narrowly into his doings; and were no leſs ill contented with good offices, by him done to ſundry of his Neighbours, than with thoſe wrongs, which they ſaid (that he did unto other ſome. Where he did harm to any; they called it, making War upon their friends: Where he did good; they called ſuch his bounty, ſeeking friends to take his part againſt them. The Dolopians, his Subjects, upon what occaſion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquiſite torments ſlew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It ſeems that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a People without ſtrength to reſiſt the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have preſumed ſo far, unleſs either they had been extreamly provoked; or elſe were ſecretly animated by the Romans. Whatſoever it was that bred this courage in them: Perſeus did ſoon allay it, and reclaim them by ſtrong hand. But the Romans took very angrily this preſumption of the King, even as if he had invaded ſome Country of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his own Rebels at home. Fain they would have had him to draw in the ſame yoke with the Carthaginians; whereto had he humbled once his Neck, they could themſelves have done the part of Maſaniſſa; though Eumenes, or ſome other fit for that purpoſe, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the League between them were ſuch, as made it unlawful, both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take Arms without their licence firſt obtained.

To the ſame paſs they would alſo fain have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents; even ſuch as had entred into League with them upon equal terms: whom uſually they rewarded with a frown, whenſoever they preſumed to right themſelves by force of Arms, without ſeeking firſt the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whoſe confidence in their proper ſtrength made them otherwhiles bold to be their own carvers; and whoſe hope of extraordiary favour at Rome cauſed them the more willingly to refer their cauſes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chaſtiſed the Meſſenians by War, T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant in taking ſuch a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any buſineſs of importance, by their own power, without ſtanding unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheleſs, upon ſubmiſſion, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little; and taught to forget their abſolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; eſpecially in uſurping the practice of Arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard leſſon, they were ſuch untoward Scholars, that they needed, and not long after felt very ſharp correction. Yet was there no ſmall part of blame to be imputed unto their Maſters. For the Roman Senate, being deſirous to humble the Achæans; refuſed not only to give them ſuch aid as they requeſted, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League between them; but further, with a careleſs inſolency, rejected this honeſt and reaſonable petition, That the Enemy might not be ſupplied from Italy, with Victuals or Arms. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affairs of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmonians or Corinthians, would revolt from the Achæans; they themſelves would think it a buſineſs no way concerning them. This was preſently after the death of Philopœmen: at what time it was believed, that the Commonwealth of Achaia was like to fall into much diſtreſs; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithſtanding; when Lycortas, Prætor of the Achæans, had utterly ſubdued the Meſſenians, far ſooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Achæans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ilfavoured grace, tell the ſame Embaſſadors, to whoſe petition they had made ſuch bad anſwer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City) That they had ſtreightly forbidden all manner of ſuccour to be carried to Meſſene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have ſerved their own turns; they manifeſted their condition; both to ſet on the weaker, againſt the ſtronger and more ſuſpected; and alſo to aſſume unto themſelves a Sovereign power, in directing all matters of War, which diſſemblingly they would have ſeemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make War, whether offenſive or defenſive; though it were againſt meer ſtrangers; without interpoſing the authority of the Senate and People of Rome: unleſs peradventure ſometimes they winked at ſuch violence, as did help towards the accompliſhment of their own ſecret malice. Now theſe Roman arts howſoever many (for gainful or timerous reſpects) would ſeem to underſtand them; yet were generally diſpleaſing unto all Men endued with free ſpirits. Only the Athenians, once the moſt turbulent City in Greece, having neither Subjects of their

their own that might rebel, nor power wherewith to bring any into ſubjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practice their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the moſt mighty. So they kept themſelves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, until the War of Mithridates: being Men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardoncravers for the vanquiſhed. Such were the Athenians become. As for thoſe other Common-weals and Kingdoms, that with over nice diligence ſtrove to preſerve their liberties and lands, from conſuming by piece-meal: they were to be devoured whole, and ſwallowed up at once. Eſpecially the Macedonian, as the moſt unpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to have affiance, was neceſſarily to be made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to break.

Neither Perſeus, nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time ſtood affected. Perſeus by reaſon of his near Neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his Subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concern him, in their affairs. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopœmen had long ſince foretold; of the miſerable ſubjection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly ſenſible of their liberty, felt themſelves grieved with the preſent ſubjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publick to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to chooſe among themſelves none other Magiſtrates, than ſuch as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other ſervile reſpect, be flatterers of the greatneſs which kept all in fear. Thus it ſeemed likely, that all domeſtical conſpiracies would ſoon be at an end; when honeſty and love of the Common-weal, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this careful proviſion for the ſafety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly advertiſed: either becauſe things were diligently concealed from their Embaſſadors, whom all Men knew to be little better than Spies, or becauſe little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by ſuch Traytors (of whom every City in Greece had too many) as were Men unregarded among their own People, and therefore more like to ſpeak maliciouſly than truly; or perhaps becauſe the Embaſſadors themſelves, being all Senators, and capable of the greateſt Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own deſires of employment. But it is hard to conceal that which many know, from thoſe that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, that ſhould both excuſe them, as touching ſome point wherein they refuſed to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the ſame buſineſs; choſe one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embaſſage. By their making choiſe of ſuch a Man; one may perceive the advantage, which miſchievous wretches, who commonly are forward in purſuing their vile deſires, have againſt the plain ſort of honeſt Men, that leaſt earneſtly thruſt themſelves into the troubleſome buſineſs of the weal publick. For this Callicrates was in ſuch wiſe tranſported with ambition; that he choſe much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himſelf therein. Wherefore inſtead of well diſcharging his credence, and alledging what was meeteſt in juſtification of his People: he uttered a quite contrary tale; and ſtrongly encouraged the Romans, to oppreſs both the Achæans, and all the reſt of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the ſetling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forego it. For now there was taken up a cuſtom, to ſtand upon points of confederacy, and Laws: as if theſe were principally to be had in regard; any injunction from Rome notwithſtanding. Hence grew it that the Achæans both now, and at other times, did what beſt pleaſed themſelves, and anſwered the Romans with excuſes: as if it were enough to ſay, That by ſome condition of League, or by force of ſome Law, they were diſcharged, or hindred, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be ſo, if He, and ſome other of his opinion, might have their wills: who ceaſed not to affirm, That no Columes or Monuments erected, nor no ſolemn Oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obſervance of Confederacy or Statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themſelves, That the multitude refuſed to give ear unto ſuch perſwaſions. For howſoever in popular Eſtates, the ſound of liberty uſed to be more plauſible, than any diſcourſe tending againſt it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, ſeeming never ſo bad, were ſure by their ſo doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increaſe apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therefore ſtrange, how the Fathers could ſo neglect the advancement of thoſe, that ſought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman Majeſty. More wiſely, though with ſeditious and rebellious purpoſe, did the Greeks: who many times, yea, and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon Men otherwiſe of little account or deſert; only for having uttered ſome brave words againſt the Romans. The Fathers, hearing theſe and the like reaſons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly thoſe that were obſtinate, and by cheriſhing their friends, to make their party ſtrong; reſolved to follow this good counſel, in every point, yea to depreſs all thoſe that held with the right, and to ſet up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the preſent unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to ſee that their Mandate (which was concerning the reſtitution of thoſe that were baniſhed out of Lacedæmon) ſhould be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callicrates; they adviſed all Men, to be ſuch, and ſo affected, as he was, in their ſeveral Common-weals. With this diſpatch, Callicrates returned home a joyful Man: having brought his Country into the way of ruin, but himſelf into the way of preferment. Nevertheleſs he forbore to vaunt himſelf, of his eloquence uſed in the Senate. Only he ſo reported his Embaſſage, that all Men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatned thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romans. By ſuch arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magiſtracy, as in all his courſes following, he omitted nothing, that might ſerve to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſneſs unto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons.

Polyb. Legat. 58.

Now

Now as the Romans by threatning Terms wan many Flatterers, and loſt as many true Friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberal Gifts, and hopeful promiſes, to aſſure unto himſelf thoſe that ill could brook his Enemies; got indeed a multitude of Partakers, though little honeſter than his Enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece diſtracted with Factions: ſome holding with the Romans; ſome with the Macedonian; and ſome few, reſpecting only the good of the Eſtates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not ſufferable, That a King, no better than their Vaſſal, ſhould dare to become head of a Faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of his Treſpaſſes: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall afford them juſt occaſion to make war upon him. Perſeus having finiſhed his buſineſs among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him; yet went, and returned, in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his Journey, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed thereby. With thoſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelf; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or Letters: praying them, That the memory of all Wrongs whatſoever, done by his Father, might be buried with his Father; ſince his own meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his Neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleaſed better, if he had behaved himſelf after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of Hoſtility in his paſſage. Yet, as if he ought not to have taken ſuch a journey, without their Licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heap of his Faults. He laboured greatly to recover the love of the Achæans: which his Father had ſo loſt, that by a ſolemn Decree, they forbad any Macedonian to enter their Territories. It was Jealouſie perhaps no leſs than Hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a Decree. For howſoever Philip had by many vile Acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Arati, given them cauſe to abhor him: yet in the publick adminiſtration of their Eſtate, he had, for the more part, been to them ſo beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general conſent, they reſolved to forſake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preſervation of Concord among them, to uſe all circumſpection; that he might not, by his Agents, negotiate and hold Intelligence with any, in a Countrey towards him ſo doubtfully affected: eſpecially when by hearkning to his Meſſages, they might make themſelves ſuſpected by their new Friends. But the continuance of this Decree beyond the time of War; and when all danger of Innovation was paſt, was uncivil, if not inhumane, as nouriſhing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good Fruit. For although they were not, in like ſort forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet underſtanding what would be due to them, if they ſhould adventure thither, none of them durſt ſet Foot therein. Hence it came to paſs, that their Bondmen, knowing a ſafe Harbour, out of which their Maſters could not fetch them, ran daily away, in great numbers; exceedingly to the loſs of ſuch, as made of their Slaves very profitable uſe. But Perſeus took hold upon this occaſion: as fitly ſerving to pacifie thoſe, whoſe enmity fain he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all theſe Fugitives, to ſend them home again: and wrote unto the Achæans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken pains to reſtore back their Servants; ſo ſhould they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily underſtood, and his Letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearſed by the Prætor, before the Council. But Callicrates took the matter very angrily: and bad them be adviſed what they did: for that this was none other than a plain device, to make them depart from the Friendſhip of the Romans. Herewithal he took upon him, ſomewhat liberally, to make the Achæans before hand acquainted with the War, that was coming upon Perſeus, from Rome. He told them, how Philip had made preparations for the ſame War; how Demetrius had been made away, becauſe of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perſeus, had, ſince his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of Peace. Briefly he rehearſed all thoſe matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invaſion of the Baſtarnæ, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journey againſt the Dolopians; his Voyage to Delphi; and finally his peaceable behaviour, which was (he ſaid) a dangerous Temptation of men to his Party. Wherefore he adviſed them, to expect the event of things, and not over-haſtily to enter into any degree of Friendſhip with the Macedonians. Hereto good anſwer was made by the Prætors Brother: That Callicrates was too earneſt, in ſo light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himſelf too well acquainted with all that had paſſed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perſeus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them ſaluted King, and Friend to the Eſtate; and that he had lovingly entertained their Embaſſadors. This being ſo: why might not the Achæans, as well as the Ætolians, Theſſalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him ſuch Correſpondence, as common Humanity required? Nevertheleſs Callicrates was grown a man ſo terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durſt not over ſtifly gainſay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and anſwer made the whilſt, That ſince the King had only ſent a Letter without any Embaſſador; they knew not how to reſolve. Better it was to ſay thus, than that they were afraid to do as they thought moſt reaſonable and convenient. But when Perſeus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and ſend Embaſſadors: then were they fain without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of Anger, and deny to give Audience: which was proof ſufficient (to one that could underſtand) of the condition wherein they lived. For hearkning to this advince of Callicrates; they were ſoon after highly commended by a Roman Embaſſador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cauſe of War was given. Liv. lib. 42.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was hufied, with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His Hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuſeth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemns his Enemies the Rhodians; with the cauſes thereof. The unuſual ſtoutneſs of the Macedonian Embaſſadors. Perſeus his attempt upon Eumenes. The Brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perſeus his device to poyſon ſome of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War againſt him, and ſend him defiance. Other things, concerning the juſtice of this War.

EUmenes King of Pergamus had been troubled about theſe times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his Neighbours. He had taken the right courſe in making firſt his complaint to the Romans; by whom he was animated with comfortable Words, and promiſes, That they by their Authority would end the Buſineſs, to his Content. But in concluſion, by the help of the Kings Pruſias and Ariarathes, he ended the War himſelf; and brought his Enemies to ſeek and accept peace, on ſuch conditions as pleaſed him to give them. After this, being at good leiſure, he began to conſider how the affairs of Macedon ſtood under Perſeus. His hatred to Perſeus was very great; and therefore he was glad to underſtand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the ſame his Enemy, was as great, and withal notorious. Now beſides his ancient and hæreditary quarrel with the Macedonian, it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate ſtore on his Father and him) began to wax every where ſtale; whilſt Perſeus, either by his currying favour, or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their beſt liking and wiſhes. For deſpight of this indignity, he ſtirred up the Lycians againſt the Rhodians his old Friends: and in helping theſe Rebels was ſo violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open War. But ſmall pleaſure found he, in theſe poor and indirect courſes of Revenge. The Lycians could not be ſaved by his Patronage, from ſevere and cruel Chaſtiſement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewiſe, his Acts of Hoſtility, little different from Robberies, made him hateful to thoſe which loved him before. As for his Honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a Decree of the Achæans, as too unmeaſured, miſ-beſeeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deſervings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not been too vainly ambitious) befel him, eſpecially for his being over-ſerviceable to the Romans, and for his Malice to that Noble Kingdom, which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to ſtand. Now for the redreſs hereof; he thought it vain to ſtrive any longer with bounty, againſt ſuch an Adverſary, as by hopeful promiſes alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he reſolved even to overturn the Foundations of this Popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the Eyes of Men, this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all ſo vainly worſhipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to perſwade thoſe that were already deſirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for ſetting forward their Wiſhes; and perhaps to be recompenced with ſome piece of the Kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like Service, when Antiochus was vanquiſhed.

Liv. lib. 42.

To this end he made a ſecond Voyage to Rome; where, though he had little to ſay which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with ſuch attention, as if they had contained ſome ſtrange Novelty, and ſo pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the Ballance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius; the expedition of the Baſtarnæ into Dardania; that of Perſeus himſelf againſt the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great Eſtimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermedling in buſineſs of his Neighbours; his Riches, and his great Proviſions; were all the material Points of Eumenes his Diſcourſe. Only he deſcended unto Particulars, having ſearched into all (as he profeſſed) like unto a Spy. He ſaid, That Perſeus had thirty thouſand Foot, and five thouſand Horſe of his own: Money in a readineſs to entertain ten thouſand Mercinaries for ten years; Arms to furniſh a number thrice as great; the Thracians his Friends at hand, ready at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as he ſhould require; and that he prepared Victuals for ten years, becauſe he would not be driven, either to live upon Spoil, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithal he prayed them to conſider, that King Seleucus, the Son and Succeſſor of Antiochus the Great, had given his Daughter Laodice in Marriage to Perſeus; Perſeus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the Match; That King Pruſias of Bythinia, by earneſt ſuit, had gotten to Wife the Siſter of Perſeus; and that theſe Marriages were ſolemnized with great Concourſe of Embaſſages from all Quarters. Neither ſpared he to tell them, (though ſeeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the Envy to their Eſtate, was the cauſe, why many that could not endure to hear of Amity with Philip, were now grown marvellouſly well affected to his Son. All this, and ſome Facts of Perſeus, which might either be denied, or juſtified (as that he had procured the death of ſome which were Friends to the Romans; and that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdom, or Lordſhip) Eumenes failed not to amplifie unto the moſt; ſaying that he thought it his Duty to forewarn them; ſince it would be to himſelf a great ſhame, if Perſeus got the ſtart of him, and were in Italy making War upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans ſtood in fear of Perſeus, leſt he ſhould ſet upon them in Italy. Nevertheleſs, foraſmuch as they loved not to make War without fair pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their Aſſociates, but of further hurt intended: great Thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furniſhed them with ſuch goodly Colour, to beautifie their Intendment. Now though it were ſo, that he told them little elſe than what they knew before; yet his Perſon and the manner of his coming, made all ſeem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embaſſadors, or upon Tales deviſed by their Flatterers and Spies, they had warred againſt Perſeus, ere he had committed any open Act of Hoſtility againſt them; their Injuſtice and Oppreſſion would have been moſt manifeſt. But when the wrongs to them done were ſo notorious, and the danger threatning them ſo terrible; that ſuch a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his own Kingdom, as far as from Asia to bid them look to themselves: who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtain their own Right and Security? Toward this justification of the War, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto; their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his Errand was well known; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of Answers to the Words, which they knew before hand that he would speak; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, or of some about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the wariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors: who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to Rebellion. The Rhodians had with great Pomp, conveighed by Sea unto Perseus, his Bride Laodice; which friendly office, as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the People of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange News which gave new Life to the Rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their own Protection any People or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meer Vassals, but as Dependants and Associates. For Proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the Commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the Victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masanissa, the Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their Subjects, had cause to find themselves agrieved if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like Decree, those their Subjects might easily be made their Fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the Ears. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

Liv. lib. 41.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of Anger. For whereas at other times, all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle Words and Excuses: now heard they plainer Language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any Deed or Word of his, that might savour of Hostility; but that, if his Travel in this kind proved vain, then would he be ready to defend himself by Arms, and stand to the chance of War, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason why Perseus himself might, at this time, think to speed better, by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the Eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman Servitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general Expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakness of Spirit, unanswerable to a work of such Importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good Countenance on a Game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to Fortune; which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this Bravery (as better it may be termed than Courage) proceeded from the Kings own Heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soon after, on a Practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make War upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there do Sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his Blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a Sacrifice, to rid his own Hands of a most mischievous Enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout Ruffians to do the Murder: who placing themselves behind a broken Mud Wall on the side of a very narrow Path leading up from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great Stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work; such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their own Companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Isle of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the Fame of his Death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his Brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took or would have taken to Wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonica the Daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the Widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare Examples of Brotherly Love, That when the King returned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his Duty, as in former times, received none other Check, than That he should forbear to marry with the Queen, until he were well assured of the Kings Death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of these Matters; but bequeathed at his Death, unto the same Brother, both his Wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his Brother; though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especial favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readiness, to have transferred the Kingdom from his Brother to him. By such Concord of Brethren was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld: as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived and employed his Grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he understood, that his Ministers had both accomplished his Will, and had saved all from discovery. But as he was deceived in the main Point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived: so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment: which he vainly esteemed the less material. For he had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this Business: and she being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret; had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himself. Brundusium was the ordinary Port for Ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a fair House; wherein he gave entertainment, being a Wealthy Man, to Embassadors, and other honourable Personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of such his Hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly Letters; as one whose many Courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming he was much made of; and shortly with more Familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings Secrets. The sum of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a Poyson of rare Quality, sure in Operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this Employment: for fear lest the Vertue of this Medicine should be tryed upon himself. But being once at liberty; he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to see again: and therefore, besides that the Kings Denial ought to be as good as such a Fellows Affirmation, the Accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himself; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withal professing, That such Objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the rightfulness of making War upon him; but rather unto a Subject pleading for his Life in Judgment. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger Proof (which might have been easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly Temper of Perseus was very sutable to these Practises. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: These his Treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private Offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not unlawfully make War upon Eumenes their Confederate; that is, if he might not send men, to waste the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Towns; might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the League to destroy the Senators by Fire or Famine, than by violence of the Sword: was it lawful for him to do it by Poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed War against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it unto him, unless he would yield to make such amends as they should require. He seems, at this time, to have been so confident, in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not War, yet he did not fear it; or at least he thought by shew of Courage, to make his Enemies the more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary they departed without Audience. Then called he them back; and bad them do their Errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference in the Isle of Samothrace, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which, they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the Evidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those Accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well beloved, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a Rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and Underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meer Spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the League, made between them and his Father, and renewed by himself indeed only for fear; but wished them to descend to more equal Conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would advise, as they might also do for theirs.

In the Form of the League between Philip and the Romans, as it is set down by Polybius, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future, excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livy inserts a Clause, whereby he was expresly forbidden, to make any War abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman Confederates were included in this Peace; whereby every one of the Neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into League with Rome, did so bind the Kings Hands, that he could no more make War abroad, than if he had been restrained by plain Covenant. And thus might that seem an Article of the Peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this Point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not bear defensive Arms, without their Permission: then had Perseus very just reason to find himself agrieved. For since they had allowed his Father, without controul, to make War in Thrace, (whilst they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their Licence: why should they now interpret the Bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chastise his own Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such Allegations he maintained the right of his Cause, in very mild sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the League, as unjust; he ministred occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their Message; he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three days. But either he should have been less vehement; or more constant in his resolution. For if his Heart could serve him to undertake the War; he should couragiously have managed it, and have fallen to work immediately, whilst the Enemy was unprepared; not have lost opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse Peace than the former.

§. VI.

The Romans ſolicit the Greeks, to joyn with them in the War againſt Perſeus. How the Greeks ſtood affected in that War. The timorouſneſs of Perſeus. Martius a Roman Embaſſador deludes him with hope of Peace. His Forces. He takes the Field; and wins part of Theſſaly. The Forces of Licinius the Roman Conſul: and what Aſſiſtants the Romans had in this War. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the War againſt Perſeus. They vex the Greeks their Friends; for whoſe eaſe the Senate makes Proviſion; having heard their Complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans been ſeeking occaſion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Proviſions. But it was on a ſudden that they met with a confluence of good Pretences to make the War: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together, ſeemed more than ſufficient. This opportunity of making their Cauſe honeſt in common opinion, was not to be neglected; though otherwiſe they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reaſon to believe, that their own ſtrength was ſuch as would prevail in the end; they haſtily embraced the fair occaſion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their unreadineſs a ſmall help, towards examining the diſpoſition of the Greeks, and others; who muſt afterwards dearly pay for any backwardneſs found in their good Will. There was not indeed any cauſe to fear, that all of the Greeks, or other Eaſtern People ſhould conſpire together, and take part with the Macedonian: ſuch was the diſſention between their ſeveral Eſtates; howſoever the generality of them were inclined the ſame way. Nevertheleſs Embaſſadors were ſent to deal with them all, and to crave their help againſt Perſeus, or rather to demand it, in no leſs ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it againſt Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embaſſadors uſed as gentle words, for faſhions ſake; as if they had ſtood in doubt, that their requeſt might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now grown well acquainted with ſuch Roman courteſie: and underſtood, that not only ſuch as made refuſal, but even they who might ſeem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this Buſineſs was ended. Wherefore none of them were ſcrupulous in promiſing the beſt of their help to the Romans; *the Achæans and Rhodians, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when thy had done their beſt, leſt it ſhould be ill taken, as if they had halted in ſome part of their duty. It is ſtrange that men could be ſo earneſt to ſet up the ſide, whereof they gladly would have ſeen the ruine. The Vulgar ſort was every where addicted to Perſeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if ſome were vehemently Roman, they wanted not Oppoſers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea the wiſeſt and moſt honeſt, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wiſhed better to Perſeus then to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chief of Hiſtorians was one; who though he *judged the Victory of Perſeus, like to prove hurtful unto Greece; yet wiſhed he the Romans ill to thrive, that ſo the Greeks might recover perfect liberty; for his endeavours in which courſe, he was at length Tyrannically handled, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. This conſidered, it appears, that an extraordinary Fear, and not only Reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans, and other Eſtates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occaſion of this their Fear, may be juſtly imputed unto the timerous Demeanour of Perſeus himſelf. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit ſhould redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppreſſed by the Romans. Yet no ſooner were ſome few Companies brought over Sea, to make a Countenance of meaning ſomewhat againſt him; than he began to ſpeak the Enemy fair, and ſue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every ſmall thing would ſerve to terrifie him; and conſequently, that it ſhould at all times be in the Romans power, by giving him any tolerable Conditions of Peace, to take Revenge at leiſure upon thoſe which had aſſiſted him: little cauſe was there, why any ſhould adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noiſe; leading about his Army; taking by force or compoſition, ſome few Towns; and ſoliciting all to join with him. But wiſe men could not be ſo beguiled. For at the ſame time, he ſought all means of Pacification: and to that end made humble ſuit unto the Roman Embaſſadors. Q. Martius, the chief of thoſe Embaſſadors, and a Man of more fineneſs in cunning than was uſual among the Romans; made ſhew of inclination to the Kings deſire: and gave out ſuch comfortable words, that the King intreated and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with thoſe Crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perſeus made none other anſwer, than the ſame which they could have made for him; yet the Embaſſadors, and eſpecially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith ſatisfied: and adviſed him to give the like ſatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done; a Truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his deſire; which was to make the King loſe time. For Perſeus had all things then in readineſs, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could have been in Greece. But by the interpoſition of this Truce, he no way increaſed his Forces; he ſuffered a moſt convenient ſeaſon of winning upon the Enemy, to ſlip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elſe, than leiſure and vain hope. Yet was he pleaſed herewith, as it had been with ſome Victory: publiſhing a Copy of the Diſputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to underſtand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. he ſent Embaſſadors alſo to the Rhodians, of whoſe good will to him he was beſt perſwaded; not only to let them know how much he was Superiour in Cauſe; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the Differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithſtanding the goodneſs of his Cauſe, he ſhould be denied Peace. Theſe were poor Helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late ſtanding upon point of Honour, was no better than meer Vanity: his own ſafety being the utmoſt of his Ambition. This his fearfulneſs might ſeem excuſable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of neceſſity, that was partly their own: had it not been his office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give ſuch a manly beginning to the War, as might incourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, Men grew daily more and more averſe from him, and were careful, not to put their ſhoulders to a falling Wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many ſtout partizans, deſired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might ſeem to do againſt the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians alſo, who had entred of late into a ſtrict ſociety with the Macedonian: renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a ſort, they yielded themſelves as Vaſſals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their ſubmiſſion under a general form; but cauſed their ſeveral Towns to make covenant apart, each for it ſelf; to the end, that being thus diſtracted into many little Common-weals, they might not (were they never ſo deſirous to rebel) have ſuch force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the City of Thebes. This work, of ſeparating the Bœotians from Thebes their head; was more than Ageſilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would ſuffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more available to Thebes, being deſtitute of help from abroad, was the Vertue of Epaminondas, and a few brave Citizens; than was the Society with King Perſeus, againſt a number not ſo great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilſt the King ſate ſtill, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the City; where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though ſome reproved it as diſhoneſt) employed again by the Senate, with commiſſion to deal as he ſhould think expedient. Touching the Embaſſadors which Perſeus had ſent; audience was given to them, for that they ſhould not plainly ſee how their Maſter was deluded: but neither excuſe nor entreaty, would ſerve their turn; the Senate being reſolved before hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days reſpite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they who came laſt on the ſame Errand, did their Meſſage without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the uſual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to ſuch Commanders, as might not, by reaſon of ſome cuſtom, enter the City) and had only the ſhort warning of eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courteſie ſerve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earneſt: but it was a likely mean, both to keep a long while from Perſeus the knowledge of his buſineſs, and to ſtagger his reſolution, when he ſhould need it moſt firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Conſul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as ſoon, as the Macedonian Embaſſadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have rouzed Perſeus, and have made him lay aſide all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himſelf tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with ſome part of his Kingdom, that ſo he might enjoy the reſt; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the ſtouteſt counſel prevailed: which alſo was the wiſeſt; and ſo would have proved, had it been ſtoutly and wiſely followed. He now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what ſhould have been done long afore. He cauſed all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readineſs, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beaſts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then, with all his Courtiers, and thoſe of his guard, ſet forward to Citium. His Army he found conſiſting of nine and thirty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe: whereof about twelve thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, were ſtrangers, of ſundry Nations, moſt part Thracians; the reſt his own Macedonians. Theſe he animated with lively Speeches; laying before them the glory of their Anceſtors, the inſolency of the Romans, the goodneſs of his cauſe, the greatneſs of his proviſions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, eſpecially in numbers. They anſwered him chearfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewiſe Meſſengers, offering to help him with Money and Victuals, according to their ſeveral abilities. He gave them thanks: but anſwered, That his own Proviſions would abundantly ſuffice; willing them only to furniſh him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he iſſued forth into Theſſaly: knowing that the Romans were to paſs through that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Theſſaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themſelves; ſome he balked, thinking them too ſtrong or well manned; and ſome he wan by force. Of theſe laſt was Mylæ; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more ſtoutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious Language to the aſſailants. It was taken by reaſon of a ſally; which the Townſmen raſhly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the Gate. All cruelty of War was practiſed here, to the greater terror of the obſtinate. So Velatiæ and Connus (Towns of much importance, eſpecially Connus, which ſtood in the ſtreights of Oſſa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the firſt. Having well fortified this paſſage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a Town ſeated on the foot of mount Oſſa; where he reſted a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Conſul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promiſed other ſtrength of auxiliaries, which was thought ſufficient. Eumenes, and Attalus his Brother, came to him in Theſſaly, with four thouſand Foot and a thouſand Horſe. Thither alſo came, from every part of Greece, ſuch aid as the ſeveral Eſtates could afford, or thought expedient to ſend: which from the moſt of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Maſaniſſa ſent thither his Son Miſagenes, with a thouſand Foot, as many Horſe, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reaſon of his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had ſent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this War; perhaps becauſe Eumenes himſelf began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwiſe adviſed than he had been in the beginning. Pruſias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perſeus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus, and Ptolemy (though Ptolemy was then young, and under Tutors) had buſineſs of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Ægyptian: yet each of them promiſed help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian:

yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals Brother, ſerved him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrrachium, uncertain to what purpoſe: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kind ſort; making ſhew to believe, That for none other end than to ſerve the Romans, their good friend Gentius had ſent thither this Fleet. But whatſoever Gentius thought in the beginning; he fooliſhly loſt both his Kingdom and himſelf, in the end of this War; by offering, rather then giving, his help to Perſeus.

With none other company than what he brought over the Sea, Licinius came into Theſſaly: ſo tyred with a painful Journey, through the mountainous Country of Athamania, which ſtood in his way from Epirus; that if Perſeus had been ready, attending his deſcent into the Plains, the Romans muſt needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreſhed himſelf and his wearied Army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his Auxiliaries, that came in as faſt as they could. It was not any ſlender help, that could enable him to deal with Perſeus. Therefore he reſolved, to abide where he then was, and keep his Trenches, until his numbers were ſufficiently increaſed: contenting himſelf in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The Land of Theſſaly, in which theſe two Armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece beſides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of ſuch a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitful, and abounding in all things needful to Mans life. In the midſt of it, but ſomewhat more to the Eaſt, was that beautiful valley of Tempe, ſo exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often uſed at large, to ſignifie the moſt pleaſant and goodly places. This valley, of it ſelf was not great: but adding to it thoſe huge Mountains, Oſſa and Olympus (famous in Poëſie) with their Spurres or Branches, by which it was on all ſides encloſed; it occupied the better part of Theſſaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unleſs they would make an hungry Journey, thorow the Countrey of the Daſſaretians, as in the former War with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perſeus therefore had no ſmall advantage, by being Maſter of the Streights leading into Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by miſpending of time he had not loſt it. For if in defending the ragged paſſages of theſe Mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worſe; yea to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in ſtrength and reputation: queſtionleſs he might have done far greater things, had he ſeized upon the Streights of Aous, which his Father once kept, and defended all the Country behind the Mountains of Pindus. Surely not without extream difficulty, muſt the Romans have either travelled by Land, with all their Carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or elſe have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needful, unto the mercy of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have ſought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courſes they once deviſed, notwithſtanding any trouble which they found in this preſent War. It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Greeks, and others, whom the King muſt have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Theſſalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his Father in the former War. The Ætolians, upon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into ſuſpicion with the Romans (as we ſhall find anon) even as ſoon as they met with Perſeus. The Bœotians, how politick ſoever Martius had wrought with them, adventured themſelves deſperately in the Macedonians quarrel: what would they have done, if he at firſt had done his beſt? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himſelf after a while began to waver, when they ſaw things go better with Perſeus, then they had expected. So that if in ſtead of diſcouraging his friends, by ſuing baſely for Peace; he had raiſed their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and encreaſed the number of his well willers, yea and bought down with Money (as he might have done) ſome of his Enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken Head: then might the Romans perhaps have been compelled to forſake their imperious Patronage over Greece; and to render the liberty, by them given, entire; which otherwiſe was but imaginary. Such benefit of this War, ſince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reaſon have been expected at firſt, from greater advantages. But as a fearful Company running from their Enemies, till ſome River ſtay their flight; are there compelled by meer deſperation to do ſuch acts, as done, while the Battel laſted, would have won the Victory: ſo fell it out with Perſeus. In ſeeking to avoid the danger of that War, whereof he ſhould have ſought the honour; he left his friends that would have ſtood by him, and gave them cauſe to provide for their own ſafety: yet being overtaken by neceſſity, he choſe rather to ſet his back to the Mountains of Tempe, and defend himſelf with his proper forces; than to be driven into ſuch miſery, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theſſaly, it is hard to ſhew particularly; for that the Hiſtory of thoſe things is much periſhed. Wherefore we muſt be contented with the Sum.

The Conſul having no deſire to fight, until ſuch time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his Trenches, and lay ſtill encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Lariſſa. That which perſwaded the Conſul to protract the time; did contrariwiſe incite the King, to put the matter unto a haſty trial. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the Field; by waſting the Land of the Pheræans their Confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity, he grew bold to adventure even unto their Trenches: out of which if they iſſued, it was likely, that his advantage in Horſe would make the Victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was ſudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themſelves to be ſafely lodged. They ſent out a few of King Eumenes his Horſe, and with them ſome light Armed Foot, to entertain skirmiſh. The Captain, and ſome other of theſe were ſlain: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reaſonable to hazzard Battel. Thus day after day, a while together, Perſeus continued offering Battel: which they ſtill refuſed. Hereby his boldneſs much encreaſed; and much more, his reputation: to the grief of thoſe, who being ſo far come to make a Conqueſt, could ill digeſt the ſhame, that fell upon them by their enduring enduring these bravadoes. The Town of Sycurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelve Miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up four hours of the Morning; but he was fain to bring Water along with him in Carts, that his Men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging, seven Miles nearer to the Enemy, whom he visited the next day by the Sun rising. His coming at such an unusual hour, filled the Camp with tumult: insomuch as though he brought with him only his Horse and light Armature, that were unfit to assail the Trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his Brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of Horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with his Legions in readiness. The honour of this Morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the Victory in a manner entire, (though the Thessalians made a good Retreat) with little loss of his own. But he discovered his weakness ere Night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to Counsel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear left he should assault their Camp; and to that purpose, upon the first news of his success, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unsent for: he nevertheless took it for sound advice, which indeed was timorous and base. To work warily, and moderate his Victory; by which means it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of Peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater; and had he won the Roman Camp, his friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for Peace: and in suing for it, even when he had the Victory, what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his Victory would admit none of these considerations. He had slain of the Roman Horse two hundred, and taken of them Prisoners the like number. Of their Foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty Horse and forty Foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heaviness and fear: it being much doubted that the Enemy would set upon it. Eumenes gave counsel to dislodge by Night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to profess, by so doing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loss past, than by standing on proud terms, to draw upon himself a greater calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the Night, and incamped more strongly on the further side. The Ætolians were sorely blamed for this loss: as if rather a Trayterous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were Men of especial mark, had been observed, to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learn, by examples of either kind, that if they would shun indignation, or incur favour, then must they adventure no less for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former days errour; which how great it was, he not until then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that Night: his light Armature alone being sufficient to have routed them, whilst they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoils among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour sound. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to press them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily perswaded to use the occasion which he seemed to have, of obtaining Peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yield unto the same conditions, wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans, if the War might so take end. It were needless, here again to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired Peace, there was in the Consul no greater power, than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People, to approve the conditions, and ratifie the League. And of such a Truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of Peace there was none; save that Perseus would yield both his Kingdom and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the Peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with Money, the King withdrew himself back to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagenes the Son of Masanissa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance between the King and them, caused the Romans to wax the more bold in making their harvest: about which business they ranged over all the Fields. Their careless demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a Guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of Horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great Battel, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, ſens after a few days to fall back into Macedon; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was: whereby what loſs he felt will appear hereafter. He left all behind him, ſave only Tempe, weakly guarded: and conſequently an eaſie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went ſtreight unto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and ſo to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back upon the Perrhæbians and others; from whom he wan ſome Towns, and among the reſt, Lariſſa. There were ſundry Towns thereabout, bearing the ſame name of Lariſſa: ſo that this which the Conſul took, may ſeem, not to have belonged unto the Theſſalians; unleſs, perhaps, after his Victory, Perſeus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got ſome part of Theſſaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a preciſe account; for that the Hiſtories of them are greatly defective. One may think it ſtrange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embaſſador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his own will, ſhould not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navy on their Coaſt. But more ſtrange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other petty Towns, which by that ſame diſtraction of the Bœotians, became within themſelves more abſolute, than formerly they had been. The cauſes hereof were to have been ſought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now loſt. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly puniſhed by Lucretius the Roman Admiral; who got ſo much by ſpoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebel in like ſort, if by extream oppreſſion he could have driven them ſo far. Neither was Licinius the Conſul undiligent in the ſame kind. What his doings were, after ſuch time as he was at leiſure from Perſeus, I find no where mentioned. Only this is ſaid in general; That in the War which he made, he * cruelly and covetouſly demeaned himſelf.

* Liv. lib. 43.

After the ſame faſhion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hoſtilius the Conſul, and Hortenſius the Admiral, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hoſtilius ſhewed more of his induſtry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in proſecuting the War againſt the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman War upon his Kingdom, after that the Conſul had ſought paſſage in vain over certain Mountains, Perſeus ſeemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed on that ſide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conſul ſent thither with an Army of four thouſand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Uſcana, a border Town of Illyria, by Treaſon, came thither in ſuch careleſs order, that the inhabitants which had made ſhew of treaſon, with purpoſe only to train him into danger, ſallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chaſed him ſo far, that hardly he eſcaped with a fourth part of his Company. Yet this Town of Uſcana ſhortly after became Roman: which howſoever it happened, Perſeus very ſoon recovered it, and many other places therewithal: Cotys, a Thracian King, ſecuring him on the one ſide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epircte revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perſeus likewiſe made a painful Journey into Ætolia: where he was promiſed to be admitted into Stratus, that was the ſtrongeſt City in that Region. Of this hope, though he were diſappointed by thoſe of the Roman faction; yet in his return home, he took in Aperantia; and ſhortly heard good news, That Ap. Claudius was again throughly beaten by Clevas, one of his Lieutenants. Such ſucceſs had the Macedonian War under Hoſtilius. The ſame Conſul offended much the Greeks, by the ſtrict inquiſition which his Embaſſadors made into Mens affection towards Rome. For theſe Embaſſadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponneſus, gave out ſpeeches tending to ſhew, That they liked no better of thoſe who ſought not by might and main to advance their buſineſs, than of thoſe which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accuſed by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the ſteps of Philopœmen; and together with him, his Son Polybius, who ſoon after was General of the Achæan Horſe; but more notable by that excellent Hiſtory which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honorably diſcharged. The ſum of the accuſation ſhould have been; That theſe were not hearty friends unto the Romans, but ſuch as abſtained from raiſing troubles, more for lack of opportunity, than for any love to the common quiet. But ſince no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to ſuch a tale; it was thought better, for the preſent, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hoſtages; and found ſome in the Council that approved the motion: as alſo among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman Garriſons beſtowed in their Towns. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions took effect. They of the Roman faction, accuſed not only ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but alſo the good Patriotes; making it no leſs then a matter of Treaſon, to be a Gretian in Greece. On the contrary ſide, there wanted not ſome, who roundly told theſe Pick-thanks of their baſe flattery; rating them openly in ſuch ſort, that one of them hardly eſcaped being ſtoned, even in preſence of the Embaſſadors. Thus was all full of accuſations and excuſes: among which the Embaſſadors carried themſelves, as Men that could believe none ill; though it were well enough known what they thought. The beſt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and publiſhed, to this effect: That it ſhould be free for all Men, to refuſe obedience to any Roman Magiſtrate, impoſing any burthen for the preſent War, unleſs it were ſuch, as the Senate had likewiſe thought meet. Of this Decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or ſeemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that ſtanding on priviledge hereof, refuſed to fulfil every Commandment, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this War proved little better, if not worſe, than to have been Traytors. The Senate was driven to ſet down this order; by reaſon of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiſtrates, and eſpecially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortenſius. Lucretius was condemned in a great Sum of Money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their Subjects oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in office, had warning to amend.

Among

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſs of injuries, or to offer their Services: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Town of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flattery. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred Horſemens Targets, and a Crown of Gold, to beſtow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquiſite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be ſingular; and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the Town Rome, and appointed Anniverſary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that Goddeſs. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and the like vain Men, that would be thought Gods; or at the ſhameleſs flattery of ſuch as beſtowed upon Men, and not the moſt vertuous of Men, divine honours; when he ſees a Town of Houſes, wherein powerful Men dwell, Worſhipped as a Goddeſs, and receiving (without ſcorn of the givers, or ſhame of the preſent) the Title of Deity, at the gift of ſuch a raſcal City as Alabanda?

After two years of the Macedonian War, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the War began, which had been thought likely to reform all thoſe Countries, and bring them to what paſs the Romans deſired, as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he lived in Peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian ſide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the War might prove, and thereupon to become wiſe for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius and Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the other ſpent their time in vain, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by many loſſes received. The Roman Admirals had ſo demeaned themſelves, that many Towns, even of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman ſide; and the Army much leſſened, not only by caſualties of War, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſul himſelf (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licencing the Souldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded unto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleſs was more than he knew how to do: though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of Men. He began hotly to ſet the War on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And he began the right way: not ſeeking to force the Streights that were ſurely Guarded, but taking pains to clime the Mountains, which were thought able to forbid all paſſage over them, without help or need of any cuſtody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, diſtributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his Journey: with hope, either not to be diſcovered by the Enemy, or to break through all oppoſition, or at leaſtwiſe, to fight on as convenient ground, as they ſhould have that lay to ſtop him; and at length, if all failed, to make a ſafe Retreat. He ſent before him four thouſand of his moſt expedite Foot, to diſcover the ways. Two day was this Company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe piece of ground; and ſent back word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three days together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loſs on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a Mountain, which gave ſcarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe, it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt. Part of his Men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilſt he, with the reſt, fetcht a compaſs about, and ſought out ways that never had been trodden. Herein he found extream difficulty: which notwithſtanding he overcame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch Journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand to make paths where none were, yea where Nature might ſeem to have intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteep he found the deſcent of the Mountains, in this way which he took: that of ſeven miles, which they travelled the firſt day, his Men were compelled, for the more part, to rowl themſelves down; as not daring to truſt their Feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with Rocks, that ſtood one over another, ſo upright, and cumberſome to get down; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy proſpect, and caſting their Governours, made a terrible noiſe, which affrighted the Horſes, and bred great confuſion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous Journey; there was nothing more deſired by the Souldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creep back again, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kind of Bridges, like unto falling Draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the Cliff; the other ſuſtained by two long Poſts, faſtened in the ground below. Upon theſe two Poſts, or Poles, which indeed (not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were faſtened two Rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, between the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one Bridge might reach to the beginning of another. Theſe were covered with Planks and Turf; that they might ſeem continent with the Ground; ſo to make the Beaſts adventurous, to go upon them. If there were a Plain of any good extent from the foot of a Rock, to the next downfal; then might the Bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of theſe; the Poſts upholding the Frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſinck down unto the next Bridge: whence he was conveyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill, to the very bottom. Thus went they down ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their Buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appears, how throughly provided the Romans uſed to be in their Journeys, of things needful in all occaſions: as alſo what ineſtimable pains they took in this deſcent, about the conveyance of themſelves and all their Carriages down the Mountains. The next day they reſted: ſtaying for Popilius and his Company, who hardly, or perhaps never, ſhould have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and ſet upon him from aloft. The third and fourth days Journeys were like unto the firſt: ſave that cuſtom, and the nearneſs to their ways end without meeting Enemy, cauſed them the better to endure the labour.

Perſeus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: ſince they fought with his Men upon the paſſage, three days together; he lying ſo nigh, that he might well near have heard the noiſe. Yet was he ſo poſſeſſed with fear; that he neither ſtirred to help his own Men, or to hinder the Conſul, nor made any proviſion for that which might fall out; but as one void of counſel, ſate kearkening after the event. Four only paſſages there were, leading into Tempe: the firſt by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the ſecond and third were the ſame which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it: the laſt, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All theſe were ſufficiently guarded: and whoſoever would ſeek any other way, muſt be fain to take ſuch pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the reſt: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his Enemies could not get thither, ſave through the valley it ſelf, into which they muſt firſt pierce another way. Dium ſtood upon the foot of the huge Mountain Olympus, about a Mile from the Sea: of which Mile, the River Helicon becoming there a Lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one half; the reſt being ſuch as might eaſily have been fortified. Beſides all theſe, there was in the midſt of Tempe, a paſſage which ten Men might eaſily keep: where the Spurs of the Mountains, reaching far into the Valley, drew near to the very Banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep River which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had been more eaſie, than to make the Conſul repent him of his troubleſome Journey: if Perſeus could have ſeen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill caſe to fight, after the vexation of that miſerable travel: but muſt needs have either periſhed for want of Victuals, or been enforced to return the ſame way that it came, if the King had maintained the ſtreight of Dium. To have returned, and climed up with their Elephants and Carriages, againſt thoſe Rocks, from which, with extream labour, they could hardly get down, it ſeems a matter of impoſſibility: eſpecially conſidering, how the Enemy, from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the Path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they ſtole away from him. It may therefore be thought ſtrange, that the Romans did not rather take their Journey into Macedon, from the ſide of Illyria, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themſelves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no means to eſcape, without forcing one of thoſe paſſages, which they deſpaired to win. But the Cowardize of Perſeus, did commend the counſel by them followed, as wiſe. For he no ſooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe; than he fared like one out of his wits; ſaying, That he was vanquiſhed, and had loſt all without Battel. Herewithal he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haſte; and ſtraightways abandoned the Town. In the ſame vehemency of amazement, he ſent a ſtrait commandment to Theſſalonica, that the Arſenal there ſhould be ſet on fire; and to Pella, that his Treaſures there ſhould be caſt into the Sea: as if the Romans were like preſently to be maſters of theſe two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drown the Treaſure, performed it haſtily as well as he could: though ſoon after, his Maſter grew ſorry for the loſs; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the Water. But Andronicus, who had charge to ſet on fire the Kings Arſenal, deferred the execution; foreſeeing that repentance might follow: and ſo he prevented the damage. Whether, Nicias, for his abſolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more eaſie pardon; it reſted in the King to interpret. The reward of their ſervice was this. Perſeus growing aſhamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this haſty direction, cauſed them both to be ſlain. Alſo thoſe poor Men, which had fetcht his Treaſure out of the Sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the ſame ſort; that ſo there might be no witneſs of the Kings baſe folly. Such end muſt they fear, who are privy to diſhonourable actions of great Princes. If Perſeus would have gone ſurely to work, for the hiding of his fault; then muſt he ſo Royally have behaved himſelf, that no Man might believe him to be the Author of any unworthy act or counſel. But his vertue was of no ſuch capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had ſtopped the Conſul on the Top of the Mountain) and Aſclepiodatus, from defence of the paſſages, whereto they were by him appointed, he rated them openly; ſaying, that they had betrayed unto the Enemy, the Gates and Bars of Macedon. Of this reproach if they would diſcharge themſelves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have ſped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Conſul Martius had great cauſe to rejoyce, for that the King ſo haſtily relinquiſhed his poſſeſſion of Tempe, and all the paſſages leading thereinto: ſince the Roman Army, this notwithſtanding, was hardly able to ſubſiſt, for want of Victuals. He took Dium without reſiſtance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a days Journey, and gotten one Town that yielded, he was compelled, by meer lack of food for his Men, to return back towards Theſſaly. His Fleet came to him, in this time of neceſſity, well appointed to have holpen him in the War: but having left behind, at Magneſia, the Ships of burthen, which carried the Proviſions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Caſtles about Tempe, which were forſaken by the Macedonians: for by thoſe ways only might Corn be brought into the Army.

To

To meet the ſooner with this Corn, which was deſirouſly expected; he forſook Dium, and went to Phila; by which fooliſh Journey (if not worſe than fooliſh) he loſt more, than a little the longer faſting had been worth. It is probable, that his Carts, with all or the moſt of his ſtore, were loſt among the Mountains: for otherwiſe it had been madneſs to put himſelf on ſuch an Enterpriſe, ſo ſlenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or ſight of the Enemy, he ſhould be fain to quit it. Howſoever it was; Men thought him a Coward, or at leaſt a bad Man of War; ſince he thus recoyled and gave off, when it moſt behoved him to have proſecuted the Action.

By underſtanding the Folly or Cowardiſe of Martius; the King recollected himſelf; underſtood his own Error; ſought to hide it by ſuch poor means as have been ſhewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repoſſeſſed the Town of Dium, which he haſtily repaired, finding it diſmantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped ſtrongly by the River Enipeus: meaning there to ſtop the Enemies Proceeding all that Summer. Leſs diligence, more timely uſed, would have been enough not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of Peace: but to have given him ſuch a Noble Victory, as might cauſe the Romans to ſeek a good end of the War upon fair Conditions, and not to begin again in haſte. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Conſul an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the Conqueſt in hand, in all the continuance of his Office. Only the Town of Heraclea, ſtanding on the River of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force; or rather by a trick of climing upon Mens Heads, ſomewhat after the manner of our Tumblers. But it made ſuch defence as it could; and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did ſet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope, was nothing like ſo great: his chief care being to provide for his wintering. He ſent the Admiral to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Theſſalonica, Caſſandrea, Demetrias and others. All theſe were aſſayed: but in vain. The Fields about Theſſalonica were waſted; and ſome Companies, that ſundry times adventured forth of the Town, were ſtill put to the worſe. As for the Town it ſelf, there was danger in coming near it, either by Land or Sea; by reaſon of the Engines, which ſhot from the Walls, and reached unto the Fleet. Wherefore the Admiral ſetting ſail from thence, ran along by Ænia, and Antigonea (landing near to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came unto Pallene, in the Territory of Caſſandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty Ships of War: and five other were ſent thither from King Pruſias. With this acceſs of ſtrength the Admiral was bold to trie his Fortune at Caſſandrea: (which was bad. There was a new Ditch lately caſt by Perſeus, before the Town: which while the Romans were filling up, queſtion was made, what became of the Earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the Bank. By this occaſion, it was learned, that there were Arches in the Town Wall filled up with that Earth, and covered with one ſingle row of Brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the Town, by ſapping the Walls. To this work he appointed ſuch as he thought meeteſt: giving an Alarm to the other ſide of the Town, thereby to ſhadow his attempt. The Breach was ſoon made. But whilſt the Romans were ſhooting for joy, and ordering themſelves for the Aſſault: the Captains within the Town perceived what was done; and ſallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the Companies that were between the Ditch and the Wall; of whom they ſlew about ſix hundred, and ſuffered few to eſcape unwounded. This diſaſter, and the want of good ſucceſs on that part of the Town which King Enmenes aſſailed (a ſupply in the mean while entring the Town by Sea) cauſed the Siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewiſe he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias; whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with ſuch Forces, as were not only ſufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admiral had layed ſiege to it, but to keep the Land about it from Spoil; or at leaſt (as they did) to make the Enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibœa; whither the Conſul (that he might not be quite without work) had ſent his Lieutenant to beſiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing ſuddenly over their Heads, cauſed the Beſiegers to diſlodge in all haſte, ſetting their Camp on fire.

Such Fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, ſo far was their Ability ſhort of their Enterpriſes; ever ſince their Conſul (whether daſtardly, or careleſly) moſt unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forſaking Dium: Yea, it is to be ſuſpected, that ſome greater harm befel them, or at leaſt, that they were in ſome greater danger, than is expreſſed in the broken remaining Hiſtory of this War. For Martius perſwaded the Rhodians, by Ageſipolis their Embaſſador, who came to him at Heraclea about other buſineſs of leſs importance, That they ſhould do well to interpoſe themſelves as Mediators, and ſeek to finiſh the War. Now, although Polybius do moſt probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily ſeeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoſing the reſolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perſeus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet ſince he made ſhew of fear, it is like withal, that ſomewhat had happened, which might make his fear ſeem not counterfeit. And ſo were the Rhodians moved to think of him; not only for that the extraordinary courteſie, both of him and of the Admiral, towards their Embaſſador, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cauſe it; but much more, for that ſhortly after the Embaſſadors of Perſeus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did ſet out their buſineſs at Rhodes, not more with the ſtrength of a good Fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the Honour of ſome Victory, wherein he had lately ſlain great numbers of the Roman Horſe. Thus much we find intimated: though the time, place, or other circumſtances of the Fight be not ſpecified. And hereto may be referred, the report of thoſe that were ſent from Rome, to view the Eſtate of Martius his Army. For they found the Conſul wanting Meat; the Admiral wanting Men; and, for thoſe few that he had, wanting both Money and Cloaths: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the Frontier of Illyria, ſo unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwiſe, he was in extream danger, ſo as either he muſt quickly be ſent for thence, or a new Army be ſent thither to him. Wherefore it may ſeem, that ſome blow had been taken on the Illyrian ſide, which made all to halt; or at leaſt, that the Romans with greater loſs, than is before ſpoken of, had been driven from ſome of the Towns which they beſieged.

Now although it were ſo, that Martius in very few of his Actions, behaved himſelf like a man of War: yet in exerciſe of Cunning, which one hath moſt aptly termed, a crooked or ſineſter kind of wiſdom, he dealt as a Craftſmaſter, with a reſtleſs working diligence. This indeed neither proved his Sufficiency, nor commended his Honeſty: ſince thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit: and nevertheleſs, out of envy, vain-glory, or ſuch delight as weak and buſie-headed Men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made oppoſition to the good of his Countrey. At ſuch time as Perſeus, by the ſucceſs of his doings againſt Hoſtilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Theſſaly; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriots among the Achæans, judged it expedient for their Nation to help the Romans, as in a time of adverſity, whom in proſperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo propoſed a Decree which paſſed: That the Achæans ſhould ſend their whole Power into Theſſaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Army was levyed; and Polybius, with others, ſent Embaſſadors unto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleaſure. Polybius found the Conſul buſied in ſeeking paſſage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army; and awaited the Conſuls leiſure, till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, he preſented the Decree, and offered the ſervice of his Nation, wherein ſoever it ſhould be commanded. Martius took this very kindly; but ſaid, that he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polybius diſpatched home his Companions, to ſignifie thus much: tarrying himſelf behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius deſired, or rather imperiouſly required of the Achæans, five thouſand men, to be ſent him into Epirus. It was manifeſt, that Appius had need of theſe men; and that if he were ſtrong in Field, he might do notable ſervice, by diſtracting the Forces of Perſeus. But the Labyrinthian Head of Martius could not allow of ſuch plain reaſon. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of ſuch aid: and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wiſe take order that the Men might not be ſent, nor the Achæans be put to ſuch needleſs charges. Away went Polybius; muſing, and unable to reſolve, whether it were for love to the Achæans, that the Conſul was ſo earneſt in this buſineſs; or rather for envy, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, ſince himſelf could do nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Council, touching this matter: then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own ſelf, and thoſe of his Party. For as he was ſure to incur the great indignation of the Conſul, if he ſhould neglect what was given him in charge; ſo was it manifeſt on the other ſide, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his Friends, if openly they ſhould refuſe to help Claudius, alledging that he had no need. In this caſe therefore, he had recourſe unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted Men from neceſſity of doing what the Roman Commanders ſhould require, unleſs by ſpecial order from the Senate, the ſame were likewiſe appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Conſul; by whom it was ſure to be made fruſtrate. Hereby the Achæans were ſavers of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himſelf ran into danger of Appius his diſpleaſure; and for ſuch honeſt dealing in his Countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years impriſonment.

Polyb. Legat. 78.

Whether it were by the like Policy of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his Affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to ſtand in fear, leſt the Fire which he himſelf had helped to kindle, would ſhortly take hold on his own Lodging; or whether the regard of Money were able to overſway all other Paſſions; it is hard to determine: ſince they that had better means to know the truth, have not preciſely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not ſo much as give any help to Martius: but coming to have joyned with him, in ſuch friendly manner as he did with the former Conſuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in ſuch anger, that he refuſed to leave behind him certain Horſe of the Gallo-Greeks, being requeſted to have done it. If this were true; and that his Brother Attalus tarrying behind with the Conſul, did the Romans good ſervice: then is the reaſon apparent, of the hatred, born afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received, that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perſeus his deſire of accord, for meer deſire of gain. And it might well be, that covetouſneſs drew him on, in the courſe, whereinto indignation firſt led him. Howſoever it befel; Perſeus cauſed Eumenes to be ſounded, and found him ſo tractable, that he was bold to ſolicite him by an Embaſſage. The Tenour of his Advertiſements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was, That there could be no perfect Love, between a King and a Free City: that the Romans had quarrel alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and uſed the help of one againſt another; That Philip was oppreſſed by them, with the help of Attalus; Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perſeus aſſailed, with help of Eumenes and Pruſias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to conſider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Aſia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Pruſias, than of him. In like ſort he admoniſhed Antiochus, not to look for any good concluſion of his War with the Ægyptian, ſo long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their Will and Pleaſure. Finally, he requeſted both of them, either to compel the Romans, to ſurceaſe from their War upon Macedon; or elſe to hold them as common Enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with ſuch Remonſtrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, ſo had he reaſon to ſtand in doubt of the reſt. Yet when he ſhould give anſwer; he began to offer a bargain of Peace for Money. He thought the Romans to be no leſs weary, than Perſeus was afraid. Wherefore he promiſed, for his own part, that if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his Hand from this War, then would he remain a Neuter therein: and that for ſome greater quantity of Money (how much I find not) he would alſo ſo bring the Romans to condeſcend unto Peace: and for aſſurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give Hoſtages. Perſeus liked well to receive the Hoſtages: but not to lay out the Money; eſpecially before hand, as was required. He would fain have Peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promiſed to be at any reaſonable coſt: but he would lay down the Money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it ſhould be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the Peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Iſle of Samothrace was Perſeus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the Money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Beſides, his labour deſerved ſomewhat, howſoever the buſineſs might happen to ſucceed: ſo that needs he would have part of his Wages in preſt. Thus the two Kings did no more, than loſe time; and Eumenes grew ſuſpected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the ſame manner dealt Perſeus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and ſaid, That without Money he could not ſtir. Hereunto Perſeus loved not to hearken; thinking that his Treaſures would ſerve at the laſt caſt, to deliver him from all his Fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his fear urge him to Prodigality; ſo as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was ſoon made, and Pledges on both ſides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perſeus; to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by ſuch acceſs of ſtrength to their Party. Preſently upon the bargain made, Embaſſadors were ſent to Rhodes, from both Perſeus and Gentius: who deſired the Rhodians, to take upon them, as Arbitrators, between Perſeus and the Romans, and to bring the War to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Conſul was no leſs deſirous of Peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promiſed, That they by their Authority, would make Peace; wiſhing the Kings to ſhew themſelves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud Words, to the ſame effect, from the Rhodian Embaſſadors; gave an anſwer, as diſdainful, angry, and menacing, as they could deviſe; ſo as this vain Glory of the Rhodians was throughly chaſtiſed; and more throughly ſhould have been, if their ſubmiſſion had not been as humble, as their Folly was proud. Such uſe of Gentius his Friendſhip, made Perſeus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now fain he would have haſtned this young and raſh Illyrian to enter with all ſpeed into the War: but then muſt the Money be haſtned away. Pantauchus, the Macedonian Embaſſador, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by Land and Sea, whilſt the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to ſtay: he ſent word to Perſeus. Hereupon ten Talents were ſent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as earneſt of that which followed. More followed indeed; and ſealed up with the Seal of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too faſt. Before this Money came into Illyria, Gentius had laid hands upon two Roman Embaſſadors, and caſt them into Priſon. Which Perſeus no ſooner heard, than he recalled his Treaſure-bearers, and ſent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of neceſſity to make War with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the ſame time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perſeus, under one Clondicus a Petty King, ten thouſand Horſe and ten thouſand Foot, of the Gaules, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Baſtarnæ. Theſe had before hand made their bargain, and were to receive preſent pay at the firſt. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perſeus ſent one to them; deſiring their Captains to come viſit him, whom he promiſed to gratifie with goodly Rewards; hoping that the Multitude would take good words for payment. But the firſt Queſtion that their General asked, was, Whether the King had ſent Money to give the Souldiers their Pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the Meſſenger [illegible] not what to anſwer. Why then (ſaid Clondicus) tell thy Maſter, That the Gaules will not ſtir one foot further, until they have Gold, as was agreed, and Hoſtages. Perſeus hereupon took counſel: if to utter his own opinion, before men ſo wiſe that they would not contradict him, were to take counſel. He made an invective againſt the incivility and avarice of the Baſtarnæ: who came with ſuch numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thouſand Horſe of them, he ſaid, would be as many as he ſhould need to uſe; and not ſo many, that he ſhould need to fear them. It had been well done, if any of his Counſellors would have told him, that there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, ſince without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out by the way of Perrhæbia, into Theſſaly: where waſting the Countrey, and filling themſelves with Spoil, they ſhould make the Romans glad to forſake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable ſervice, whether they won any Victory, or not. This, and a great deal more might have been alledged, if any Man had dared to give advice freely. In concluſion Antigonus, the ſame Meſſenger that been with them before, was ſent again, to let them know the Kings mind. He did his Errand: upon which followed a great Murmur of thoſe many thouſands that had been drawn ſo far to no purpoſe. But Clondicus asked him now again, whether he had brought the Money along with him, to pay thoſe five thouſand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no better anſwer then ſhifting excuſes; the Baſtarnæ returned preſently towards Danubius, waſting the Neighbour parts of Thrace; yet ſuffering this crafty Meſſenger to eſcape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perſeus, like a careful Treaſurer, and one that would preſerve his Money for the Romans, without diminiſhing the ſum. But of this painful Office he was very ſoon diſcharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Conſul: who in fifteen days after his ſetting forth from Italy, brought the Kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which GOD had appointed over it a King ſo fooliſh and ſo cowardly.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much diſhonour. Which though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity ſo moved them, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwiſe their manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow Conſul; or at leaſt were gladder that the lot had caſt it upon him, than that ſo worthy a Man was advanced to the dignity of a ſecond Conſulſhip. He refuſed to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; until by Embaſſadors, thither ſent to view the E ſtate of the War, it was perfectly underſtood, in what condition both the Roman Forces, and the Macedonian, at the preſent remained. This being throughly known to be ſuch, as hath been already told; the Senate appointed a ſtrong Supply, not only unto the Conſul, but unto the Navy, and likewiſe to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which Ap. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius ſent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the Cuſtom, ſpake with much Gravity and Authority. He requeſted thoſe that thought themſelves wiſe enough to manage this War, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there aſſiſt him with their Advice; or elſe to govern their Tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearſay, and cenſure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occaſions; not to the expectation of the Multitude. The like Speech of his Father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the Battel of Cannæ, might well be living in ſome of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themſelves the more gladly unto the inſtructions given by a wiſe and reſolute Conſul.

* Plutarch in vit. Æmyl.

All his buſineſs within the City being diſpatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his ſetting forth on his Journey; with an eſpecial hope of Men, that he ſhould finiſh the War: though that he ſhould finiſh it ſo ſoon and happily, was more than could have been hoped or imagined. He came to Brunduſium; whence, when the Wind came fair, he ſet Sail at break of day, and arrived ſafely at the Iſle of Corcyra before night. Thence paſſed he to Delphi: where, having done Sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he ſet forwards to the Camp; and was there in five days more. So are there but five of the fifteen days remaining, in which he finiſhed the War.

Perſeus lay ſtrongly encamped at Dium; having ſpared no labour of Men and Women to fortifie the Banks of Enipeus, where it was fordable in dry weather. So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and conſequently as little poſſibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much diſabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of freſh Water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea Shore and the Foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that ſide. But Æmylius found preſent remedy for this, by digging Wells on the Shore where he found ſweet Springs; as commonly there is no Shore that wants them, though they riſe not above the Ground. Want of this Knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking up his Lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleaſure, but could perform no ſervice of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had ſuch means to lye cloſe to the Macedonian, as it preſently did; the paſſage onward being defended as hath been ſhewed, ſeemed no leſs difficult than before. Wherefore it was neceſſary to ſearch another way; which by enquiry was ſoon found out. There was a narrow paſſage over Olympus, leading into Perræbia: hard of aſcent, but ſlenderly guarded, and therefore promiſing a fair journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durſt not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the Adventure; they fearing leſt it would prove ſuch a piece of work, as had been their march over Oſſa into Tempe. But Paulus was a Man of greater Induſtry, Courage, and Ability, to command. He had reformed, even at his firſt coming, many diſorders in the Roman Camp; teaching the Souldiers, among other good Leſſons, to be obedient and ready in Execution; without troubling themſelves, as had been their manner, to examine the Doings and Purpoſes of their General. And now he appointed about five thouſand men to this Enterpriſe: whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own Sons by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a Son of Scipio the African; the other by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him ſome light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his main ſtrength was of Legionaries. For the Kings Guard, upon the Mountain, conſiſted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though at ſome, diſtance they might do notable ſervice againſt thoſe that ſhould climb up unto them; yet when the darkneſs took away their aim, they were like to make a bad Nights work, being to deal with thoſe that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the buſineſs about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet; where Victuals were provided for their Journey: it being noiſed, that they were to run along the Coaſt of Macedon by Sea, and waſte the Countrey. All the while that they were paſſing the Mountains (which was about three days) the Conſul made ſhew of a meaning to ſet upon Perſeus where he lay; rather to divert the Kings Attention from that which was his main Enterpriſe, than upon any hope to do good, in ſeeking to get over Enipeus. The Chanel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time, a great fall of Waters from the Mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the Ground of it was ſuch, as though at the preſent it lay well-near all dry, yet it ſerved not for thoſe that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Æmylius employed none ſave his Velites; of whom the Kings light Armature had advantage at far diſtance, though the Romans were better appointed for the cloſe. The Engines from off the Towers which Perſeus had raiſed on his own Bank, did alſo beat upon the Romans, and gave them to underſtand derſtand, that their Labour was in vain. Yet Æmylius perſiſted as he had begun; and recontinued his Aſſault, ſuch as it could be, the ſecond day. This might have ſerved to teach the Macedonian, that ſome greater work was in hand: ſince otherwiſe a good Captain, as Æmylius was known to be, would not have troubled himſelf with making ſuch Bravado's, that were ſomewhat coſtly. But Perſeus only looked unto that which was before his Eyes: until his men that came running fearfully down the mountain, brought word into the Camp, That the Romans were following at their Backs. Then was all full of tumult, and the King himſelf no leſs (if not more) amaz'd than any of the reſt. Order was forthwith given to diſlodge, or rather, without order, in all tumultuous haſte, the Camp was broken up, and a ſpeedy Retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were ſo, that they which had cuſtody of the Paſſage were taken ſleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force; Scipio and Fabius had very good ſucceſs in their Journey. It may well be, that they ſlept until the Romans came ſomewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their Arrows and Slings could do little Service, were beaten at handy ſtroaks: ſo as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epiſtle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Martius in the year fore-going; but was cloſed up again, through his not proſecuting ſo rich an opportunity.

Perſeus was in extream doubt what courſe to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice, to man his Towns, and ſo to linger out the War: having been taught by the laſt years Example, how reſolute the people were in making defence. But far worſe Counſel prevailed; as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberations. The King reſolved to put all at once to hazard of Battel: fearing belike to put himſelf into any one Town, leſt that ſhould be firſt of all beſieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures always are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even the ſame that Æmylius, or any Invador, ſhould have deſired. So a place was choſen near unto Pydna, that ſerved well for the Phalanx, and had likewiſe on the ſides of it ſome pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light Armature. There he abode the coming of the Enemy; who ſtayed not long behind him. As ſoon as the Romans had ſight of the Kings Army; which, with greater fear than diſcretion, had halted away from them, forſaking the Camp that was ſo notably well fortified: they deſired nothing more, than to give Battel immediately; doubting leſt otherwiſe the King ſhould change his mind, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conſul; praying him not to loſe occaſion by delay. But Æmylius told him that he ſpake like a young Man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tired with their Journey; had no Camp wherein to reſt themſelves; nor any thing there, ſave only the bare Ground whereon they trode. For theſe and the like reſpects, the Conſul made a ſtand, and ſhewing himſelf unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of Battel; gave charge to have the Camp meaſured out and entrenched behind the Army; whereinto at good leiſure, he fell back without any manner of trouble. After a nights reſt, it was hoped both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter ſhould be determined; each part thinking their own General too blame, for that they had not fought the ſame day. As for the King he excuſed himſelf by the backwardneſs of the Enemy; who advanced no further, but kept upon ground ſerving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other ſide, the Conſul had the reaſons before ſhewed, which he communicated to thoſe about him the next day.

That Evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Prætor, foretold unto the Conſul, and (with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipſe of the Moon, which was to be the ſame Night: willing the Souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was natural, and might be known long before it was ſeen. It was the manner of the Romans, in ſuch Eclipſes, to beat Pans of Braſs and Baſons, as we do in following a ſwarm of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moon great eaſe, and helped her in her labour. But this Prognoſtication of Sulpicius converted their Superſtition into admiration of his deep Skill, when they ſaw it verified. Contrariwiſe, the Macedonians howled and made a great noiſe as long as the Eclipſe laſted: rather perhaps becauſe it was their Faſhion, than for that they were terrified therewith as with a Prodigy; betokening their loſs; ſince their deſire to fight was no whit leſſened by it. I will not here ſtand to diſpute, whether ſuch Eclipſes do ſignifie, or cauſe, any alteration in Civil Affairs, and Matters that have ſmall dependance on natural Complexion: for the Argument is too large. More worthy of obſervation it is, how Superſtition captivates the Wiſdom of the Wiſeſt, where the help of true Religion is wanting. Æmylius, though he were ſufficiently inſtructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no ſupernatural thing, nor above the reach of Human Underſtanding, ſo as he ſhould need to trouble himſelf with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his Duty, to this Moon, and congratuling with Sacrifice her delivery, as ſoon as ſhe ſhone out bright again: for which, he is commended even by Plutarch a Sage Philoſopher, as a Godly and Religious Man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not aſſiſt him in this fooliſh Devotion; yet is it like, that he being a Senator, and one of the Council for War, was partaker the next Morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leſs fooliſh. For a great part of the day was vainly conſumed, ere Hercules could be pleaſed with any Sacrifice, and vouchſafe to ſhew tokens of good luck in the Entrails of the Beaſts. At length in the Belly of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promiſe of Victory to Æmylius; but with condition, that he ſhould not give the onſet. Hercules was a Greek, and partial, as nearer in Alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new Goddeſs, lately Cannonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, Founder of their City, on whom the Romans had beſtowed his Deity; or (if a God of elder date were more Authentical) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of Military Affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour with no injunctions contrary to the rules of War.

Now concerning the Battel; Æmylius was throughly perſwaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwiſe he would not have stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the Morning Sun was full in the Romans Faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the Forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius sent forth part of his Men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about Ten of the Clock in the Morning, a small occasion brought to pass that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over earnest desire. A Horse brake loose at Watering; which two or three of the Roman Souldiers followed into the River, wading after him up to the Knees. The Kings Men lay on the further Bank; whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this Horse over to their own side. These fell to blows, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countrimen seeing this, hasted to revenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slain him over the River. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the Event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his Men in order of Battel, accordly as the manner of his Country, and the Arms, wherewith they served, did require. The Ground was a flat level, save that on the sides a few Hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better Souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their Men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King having finished his Oration, and sent on his Men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do Sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the less marvel, that he durst adventure Battel, since he had bethought himself of such a Stratagem, whereby to save his own Person. As for Hercules, he liked not the Sacrifice of a Coward: whose unseasonable devotion could be no better than hypocrisie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also to Plow, Sow, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the Battel, he found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight. The acts of this day, such as we find recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could do no manner of good: That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly press onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much astonished; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-born, many of them slain, and the Squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an Hill. These were the things that fell out adverse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to have rent his Coat-armor for grief. If the King with all his power of Horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the Victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the Battel, was the same which doubtless the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty, or almost impossibility, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small Battallions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some Files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to pass, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long Pikes of the Macedonians were of little use, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction given by Æmylius, when he saw the Front of the Enemies great Battel become unequal, and the Ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailable against many small Squadrons, as it had been formerly in the Battel of Cynoscephalæ: yea, this form of embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would break of it self; though here were little such inconvenience of Ground as had been at * Cynoscephalæ. * Chap. 4. §. 14.

Perseus when he saw his Battel begin to rout, turned his Bridle presently, and ran amain towards Pella. All his Horse escaped, in a manner, untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poor Foot; they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew above twenty thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost, in that Battel, only some fourscore, or sixscore Men at the most. Some of the Foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his Company in a Wood: where they fell to railing at the Horsemen, calling them Cowards, Traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himself: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the Company dispersed themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he fell to devising upon whom he might lay the blame of that days misfortune, which was most due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella; he found his Pages and houshold Servants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great Men that had escaped from the Battel, there was none appearing in the Court. In this Melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldness to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unseasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in fear, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly dare some greater mischief; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about five hundred Cretians; more for love of his Money, than of him. To these he gave of his Plate, as much as was worth about fifty Talents, though shortly he cozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if he would have redeemed it; but never paying the Money. The third day after the Battel he came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Townsmen to fidelity, with Tears; and his own speech being hindered by Tears, appointed Evander to speak what himself would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chief care, to look well to to themſelves. Upon the firſt fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their Town of two thouſand Thracians that lay there in Garriſon: ſending them forth under colour of a gainful employment, and ſhutting the Gates after them. And now to be rid of the King; they plainly bad Evander be gone. The King hearing this, had no mind to tarry: but embarking himſelf and the Treaſure which he had there, in certain Veſſels that he found in the River Strymon; paſſed over to the Iſle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live ſafe, by priviledge of the Religious Sanctuary therein.

Theſe miſerable ſhifts of the King make it the leſs doubtful, how all the Kingdom fell into the power of Æmylius, within ſo few days after his Victory. Pydna which was neareſt at hand, was the laſt that yielded. About ſix thouſand of the Souldiers, that were of ſundry Nations, fled out of the Battel into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confuſed rabble of ſo many ſtrangers hindering all deliberation and conſent. Hippus who had kept the paſſage over Oſſa againſt Martius, with Pantauchus, who had been ſent Embaſſador to Gentius the Illyrian, were the firſt that came in: yielding themſelves and the Town of Beræa, whither they had retired out of the Battel. With the like Meſſage came others from Theſſalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two days: the loſs of the head bereaving the whole Body of all ſenſe and ſtrength. Neither did they of Pydna ſtand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forſaken his Country: but opened their Gates upon ſuch terms, that the ſack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Æmylius ſent abroad into the Country, ſuch as he thought meeteſt, to take charge of other Cities: he himſelf marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the ſame whereof Perſeus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while he ſhall have more.

It was ſoon underſtood, that Perſeus had taken Sanctuary, in the Temple at Samothrace: his own Letters to the Conſul, confirming the report. He ſent theſe Letters by Perſons of ſuch mean condition: that his caſe was pitied, for that he wanted the Service of better Men. The ſcope of his writing was, to deſire favour: which though he begged in terms ill beſeeming a King; yet ſince the Inſcription of his Epiſtle was, King Perſeus to the Conſul Paulus; the Conſul, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refuſed to make anſwer thereunto. So there came other Letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that ſome might be ſent to confer with him about matters of his preſent eſtate. Nevertheleſs in this conference, he was marvelous earneſt, that he might be allowed to retain the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that he had ſo carefully preſerved his Treaſure, unto the very laſt: flattering himſelf with ſuch vain hopes as theſe; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect thoſe great riches in his poſſeſſion; but compound with him for Money, letting him have his deſire to live at eaſe, and be called King. Yea it ſeems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a deſire to live in this Iſle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his conſultations about the War he was dehorted by his friends, from ſeeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedon, for * ſuch a paltry Iſland; and for that he offered to lay up the Money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he finds it otherwiſe. They urge him to give place unto neceſſity, and without more ado, to yield to the diſcretion and mercy of the People of Rome. This is ſo far againſt his mind, that the conference breaks off without effect. Preſently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admiral, with his Fleet: who aſſays, as well by terrible threats, as by fair Language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole, wherein, for fear of impriſonment, he had impriſoned himſelf. When all this would not ſerve, a queſtion was moved to the Samothracians; How they durſt pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the Murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and ſend word to the King, That Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accuſed of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof unleſs he can clear himſelf in judgment, he muſt not be ſuffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence born to his Majeſty, now paſt, makes them forbear to ſay, that Perſeus himſelf is charged with the ſame Crime. But what will this avail, when the Miniſter of the Fact being brought into Judgment, ſhall (as is to be feared) appeach the Author? Perſeus therefore willeth Evander to have conſideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand, who are like to be preſidents and overſeers of this judgment: ſo as it were better to die valiantly, ſince none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cauſe; where, though he had a good Plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander ſeems to like well: and either kills himſelf, or hoping to eſcape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get Poyſon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this Man, who had ſtuck to Perſeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forſake him: ſo as none are left with him, ſave his Wife and Children, with his Pages. It is much to be ſuſpected, that they which leave him upon this occaſion, will tell perillous tales, and ſay, That the King hath loſt the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm ſo much, who ſhall dare to gainſay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that alſo lyable to diſpute, which preſerves him from captivity; he purpoſeth to make an eſcape, and fly, with his Treaſures, unto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one Ship; who eaſily was perſwaded to waft the King thence. With all ſecrecy the Kings Money, as much as could be ſo conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himſelf, with his Wife and * Children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip his elder Son, who was only by adoption his Son, being his * Brother by nature) with much ado got out at a Window by a Rope, and over a Mud Wall. At his coming to the Sea ſide, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the Money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilſt Perſeus was ſearching all along the Shoar: who had ſtayed ſo long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his Lodging: and thinking it not ſafe to enter it the common way, leſt he ſhould be taken; he hid himſelf in an obſcure corner. His Pages miſſing him, ran up and down making enquiry; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their Master in Samothrace, should have their Lives and Liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally; That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had given the custody of his Children, delivered them up to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his Son Philip, accusing the Gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himself, and made the Roman Victory complete. If he had not trusted in those Gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this War to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdom by Arms, and himself by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have been wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Æmylius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the Victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the less to be esteemed. Æmylius used to him the Language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a mind, made War upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the Mercy of the People of Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectively entreated, he was committed Prisoner to Q. Ælius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end therewithal had the Kingdom of Macedon; the Glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then known, was now translated unto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celerity, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the Money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; overcame him; and drave him into * Scodra. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seem unpossible to be won, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late Victory; and therefore presented his Army before the Walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seems, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired Truce for three days, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such mediation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into Prison; where they were still alive. Having obtained three days respite, he passed up a River, within half a Mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his Brother Caravantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scodra. He sent Messengers craving access unto the Prætor: before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yielded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his Kingdom, together with his Wife, Children, Brother, and Friends, were presently given up. So this War ended in thirty days: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, until Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon, after their Victory over Perseus.

NOw began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look Tyrannically upon those that had been unmannerly toward them before, whilst the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these Victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their Errand again. This they performed with bad grace; saying, That they were sent from Rhodes, to make an Overture of Peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this War was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for love to Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose Partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in Mourning Apparel, as humble Suppliants, they went about the City; beseeching all Men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of War from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent Prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for fear, whose Goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and less would have done, if old M. Cato, a Man by nature vehement, had not uttered a mild Sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing War against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere, by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the Society of the Romans: a favour which, till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it as equal friends.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmylius himself made progress through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias were slain at one time by those of the Roman Faction, and with help of the Roman Souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their Goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul; the redress was such, as requited not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the Liberty of their Country, he feasted like a King, with excessive chear; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easie matter, since no Man durst be backward in sending Provisions, nor set on them the due Price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to give order for setling the Estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was usual in such cases; and some, to visit the Affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Æmylius and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by half. As for the rest; the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent Captive into Italy, with their Wives and Children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Laws of the Country were abrogated; and new given by Æmylius. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not Subjects to Rome; the things done to them could deserve no better name than meer Tyranny, yea and shameless Perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custom, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oaths of Confederation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such Men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent Letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no Subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for using them as Traytors, or at least as Enemies. But since only two Men were Beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no less afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyranny. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deal more formally: not so much because that Commonwealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by Letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspitiously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their service to the Romans, but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all Men trembled for fear of Rome, the season served fitly to rank the Achæans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates, was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his Fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. He said, That some of the chief among them, had with Money and other means befriended Perseus. This being so; he desired that all such Men might be condemned, whom, after Sentence given, he would name unto them. After Sentence given (cried out the whole Assembly) what Justice were this? name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well do, we will soon condemn them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this Crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate Man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof, if any Man can accuse me, I shall throughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a thousand; willing them to appear, and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the Captivity of Greece; wherein so many of the Honestest and Worthiest Men were carried from home, for none other cause than their love unto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that Vertue and regard of the publick Liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into Prison, as Men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since Honesty had been thus punished as a Vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to inform the Senate, that these Men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offendors. But instead of better answer it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that these Men should return into Achaia. Neither could any solicitation of the Achæans, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; until after seventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that Wise and Vertuous Man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in Prison; or having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayl, after that they were committed thereto, ſuffered Death as Malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being deſirous to preſerve the Macedonian Treaſure whole; yet withal, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, That the whole Country of Epirus ſhould be put to Sack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as alſo it was performed by Æmylius with miſchievous ſubtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to uſe the Liberty beſtowed upon them by the People of Rome; he ſent unto the Epirots for Ten of the Principal Men out of every City. Theſe he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and ſent along with them, into every of their Towns, what Companies of Men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the Money. But he gave ſecret inſtruction to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed they ſhould fall to ſack, every one the Town whereinto he was ſent. Thus in one day were threeſcore and ten Cities, all Confederate with the Romans, ſpoiled by the Roman Souldiers: and beſides other acts of Hoſtility in a time of Peace, a Hundred and fifty thouſand of that Nation made Slaves. It may be granted, that ſome of the Epirots deſerved puniſhment, as having favoured Perſeus. But ſince they, among this People, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already ſent into Italy, there to receive their due; and ſince this Nation, in general, was not only at the preſent in good obedience, but had, even in this War, done good Service to the Romans: I hold this act ſo wicked, that I ſhould not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifeſt by conſent of all; it is the leſs marvelous, that God was pleaſed to make Æmylius Childleſs, even in the Glory of his Triumph, how great ſoever otherwiſe his Vertues were.

In ſuch manner dealt the Romans, after their Victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embaſſage ſent from them to Antiochus: whereof before we ſpeak, we muſt ſpeak ſomewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himſelf, and of his Affairs about which theſe Embaſſadors came.

§. XI.

The War of Antiochus upon Ægypt, brought to end by the Roman Embaſſadors.

Antiochus the Great, after his Peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the ſhort time following of his Reign and Life. He died the ſix and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the ſeventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolemy Epiphanes: while he attempted to Rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Juſtin) of Jupiter. He left behind him three Sons, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one Daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in Marriage to Ptolemy Epiphanes, King of Ægypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldeſt of Antiochus his Sons, Reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Euſebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Joſephus give him but ſeven. A Prince, who as he was ſlothful by nature, ſo the great loſs which his Father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his Birth, Daniel gave this judgement, Et ſtabit in loco ejus viliſſimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (ſpeaking of Antiochus the Father of this Man) ſhall ſtart up a vile Perſon, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, thoſe things were done which are ſpoken of Onias the High Prieſt, in theſe words, and other to the ſame effect. What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, becauſe of the Godlineſs of Onias the Prieſt, it came to paſs, that even the King did honour the place, and garniſhed the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the ſecond of Maccabes, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treaſures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus ſent by the King to ſeize them; of his miraculous ſtriking by God; and his recovery at the Prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his Succeſſor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the Reign of this King, that the Books of the Maccabees take beginning: which Books ſeem not to be delivered by one and the ſame hand. For the firſt Book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing elſe of his ſtory, nor of the acts of his Succeſſors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Brother and Succeſſor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the Hundred threeſcore and ſeventeenth year of the Greeks in Syria) that firſt Book treateth. The Author of the ſecond Book, although he take the Story ſomewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet he endeth with the Hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian Reign, and with the death of Nicanor, ſlain by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jaſon, the Brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his Succeſſor, for the Prieſthood. It is alſo held by Janſenius and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans ſent Embaſſadors to the Jews, as to their Brothers and Kinſmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the Brother and Succeſſor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epiſtle, which he himſelf directed to the People of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embaſſadors, whom he employed at the ſame time to the Senate of Rome; repeating alſo the former Letters word by word, which Arius had ſent to Onias the High Prieſt, whereto Joſephus adds, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embaſſador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a ſquare Volume, and were Sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her Claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, ſucceeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and ſeven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syriæ. He was the ſecond Son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his Brother; which alſo he uſurped from his Brothers Son.

Ptolemy Philometor, his Nephew by his Siſter Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about ſeven years King of Ægypt.

Ptolemy Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had Reigned in Ægypt four and twenty years, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdom between them, whilſt he was a Child. But they found ſuch other buſineſs, ere long, with the Romans, as made them give over their unjuſt purpoſe; eſpecially Antiochus, who gave, with his Daughter Daughter in Marriage, unto this Ptolemy, the Provinces of Cæleſyria, Phœnice, and Judea, which he had won by his Victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian Forces in thoſe Parts. Nevertheleſs, Ptolemy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater ſecurity. He left behind him two Sons; this Ptolemy Philometor, and Ptolemy Phyſcon, with a Daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was Wife to the elder of her Brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom ſhe was caſt off, and her Daughter taken in her ſtead. Such were the Marriages of theſe Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemy Philometor, ſo called (that is, the lover of his Mother) by a bitter Nick-name, becauſe he ſlew her, fell into hatred with his Subjects, and was like to be chaſed out of his Kingdom: his younger Brother being ſet up againſt him. Phyſcon having a ſtrong Party, got Poſſeſſion of Alexandria; and Philometor held himſelf in Memphis, craving Succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the Protection of the young Prince, ſought by all means poſſible to poſſeſs himſelf of that Kingdom. He ſent Apollonius the Son of Mneſtheus Embaſſador into Egypt, and under colour to aſſiſt the Kings Coronation, he gave him inſtructions to perſwade the Governours of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew with the principal places of that Kingdom into his Hands; pretending an extraordinary care and deſire of his Nephews ſafety and well doing. And the better to anſwer all Argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he alongſt the Coaſt of Syria, to Joppe, and from thence on the ſudden he turned himſelf towards Jeruſalem, whereby

Mac. 2. cap. 3. Epiphanes, that impious Traytor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the Treaſures thereof to Apollonius the Governour of Cæleſyria and Phœnicia, was diſappointed of his wicked Purpoſe by Miracle from Heaven; the ſaid Apollonius being ſtricken by the Angel of God, and recovering again at the Prayer of Onias: yet ſufficed not this Example to terrifie others from the like ungodly Practiſes. Preſently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jaſon, the Brother of Onias, ſeeking to ſupplant his Brother, and to obtain the Prieſthood for himſelf, offered unto the King three hundred and threeſcore Talents of Silver, with other Rents and
Mac. l. 2. c. 4. and Sums of Money. So he got his deſire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jaſon, and his being over-reached by another, in the ſame kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achæans, when as that miſchievous Callierates, who had been too hard for all Worthy and Vertuous Men, was beaten at his own Weapon, by one of his own Condition. It went thus.

One Fire than other burns more forcibly.
One Wolf than other Wolves does bite more ſore;
One Hawk than other Hawks more ſwift does fly.
So one moſt miſchievous of Men before,
Callicrates, falſe Knave as Knave may be,
Met with Menalcidas more falſe than he.

And even thus fell it out with Jaſon: who within three years after, was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelaus the Brother of Simon, that for three hundred Talents more, obtained the Prieſthood for himſelf: Jaſon thereupon being forced to flie from Jeruſalem, and to hide himſelf among the Ammonites.

From Jeruſalem, Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his Men of War; and to prepare a Fleet for his Expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty Army of Land-Forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the Dominion of two Realms, and entred Egypt with a mighty Company, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horſemen, and with a great Navy, and moved War againſt Ptolemaves King of Egypt, but Ptolemaves was afraid of him and fled, and many were wounded to death. He wan many ſtrong Cities, and took away the Spoils of the Land of Egypt. Mac. 1. c. 1. v. 17. Verſ. 18. 19. 20. &c. Dan. c. 11. v. 24. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecy of Daniel. He ſhall enter into the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he ſhall do that which his Fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria ſo great a Victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them ſo great Riches. For he gave a notable Overthrow to the Captains of Ptolemy, between Peluſium and the Hill Caſſius; after which, he entered and ſackt the greateſt and richeſt of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. Hierom. in Dan. In concluſion, after that Antiochus had ſmitten Egypt, he turned again and went up towards Iſrael and Jeruſalem, with a Mighty People, and entered proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the Golden Altar, and the Candleſtick for the Light, and all the Inſtruments thereof, and the Table of the Shew-bread, and the pouring Veſſels and the Bowls, and the Golden Baſons, and the Vail, and the Crowns, and the Golden Apparel. He took alſo the Silver and the Gold, and the Precious Jewels, and the Secret Treaſures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men, Mac. l. 1. c. 1.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian War that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian buſineſs. At what time he firſt laid claim to Cæleſyria; juſtifying his Title by * the ſame Allegations which his Father had made; and ſtiffly averring, that this Province had not been conſigned over to the Egyptian, or given in dowry with Cleopatra. Eaſie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a fair way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, preſſed him, by ſeveral Embaſſages, to ſome good concluſion. But his anſwer was; that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder Brother of the Ptolemies, then ſhould the War be preſently at an end; otherwiſe not. Yet when he ſaw that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force; he thought it better to let the two Brothers conſume themſelves with inteſtine War, than by the terrour of his Arms, threatning deſtruction unto both of them, to put into them any deſire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his Forces for the preſent; leaving the Ptolemies in very weak eſtate; the younger, almoſt ruinated by his Invaſion: the elder hated and forſaken by his People. Lib. 6. * Cap. 5. §. 2. Polyb. Legat. 81. 82. &c.

But how weak ſoever theſe Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be ſo ſtrong, that Antiochus might leave them to the proſecution thereof; and follow, at good leaſure his other buſineſs at Jeruſalem or elſewhere. So after the Sack of Jeruſalem, he reſted him a while at Antioch; and then made a Journey into Cilicia, to ſuppreſs the Rebellion of the Tharſians and other in thoſe parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry, ry, to a Concubine of the Kings called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his abſence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great Authority about him. In the mean while Menelaus the Brother of Simon, the ſame who had thruſt Jaſon out of the Prieſthood, and promiſed the King three hundred Talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Prieſthood to his Brother Lyſimachus, ſtole certain Veſſels of Gold out of the Temple: whereof he preſented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and ſold the reſt at Tyre, and other Cities adjoyning. This he did, as it ſeemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred Talents promiſed; the ſame being now by Soſtratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prieſt (formerly dipoſſeſſed by Jaſon) had certain knowledge, being moved with Zeal, and deteſting the Sacriledge of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge he withdrew himſelf into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a Subburb to Antioch. In compaſs it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, ſweet Springs, Banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abuſed to Luſt, and other ſuch Voluptuouſneſs. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himſelf to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim priviledge from the holineſs of a Ground Conſecrated to any of the Heathen Gods, I will not ſtand to diſcourſe. Only I ſay for my own opinion; that the inconvenience is far leſs, to hold this Book as Apochryphal; than to judge this fearful ſhift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the Book ſeems to do. As for this refuge, it could not ſave the life of the poor old Man: For Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to ſlay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counſelled him craftily, giving him his right Hand with an Oath, and perſwading him to come out of the Sanctuary: ſo he ſlew him incontinently, without any regard of Righteouſneſs. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus, after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his Garment of Purple, and rent his Cloaths, and commanded him to be led through-out the City, and in the ſame place where he had committed the Wickedneſs againſt Onias, he was ſlain as a Murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent Mans death, I ſhould have thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Juſtice. But preſently after this, at the ſuit of one Ptolemy, a Traytor to Ptolemy Philometor, he condemned innocent Men to death; who juſtly complained againſt Menelaus, and his Brother Lyſimachus, for a ſecond robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Veſſels of Gold remaining. Hereby it is manifeſt, that he was guided by his own outragious Will, and not by any regard of Juſtice: ſince he revenged the death of Onias, yet ſlew thoſe that were in the ſame cauſe with Onias, Who had they told their cauſe, yea, before the Scythians, they ſhould have been heard as innocent. By reaſon of ſuch his unſteadineſs, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in ſtead of Epiphanes, which ſignfieth Noble or Illuſtrious.

After this, Antiochus made a preparation for a ſecond Voyage into Egypt, and then were there ſeen throughout all the City of Jeruſalem, forty days long, Horſemen running in the Air with Robes of Gold, and as Bands of Spearmen, and as Troops of Horſemen ſet in Array, encountring and courſing one againſt another. Of theſe Prodigious Signs, or rather forewarnings of GOD, all Hiſtories have delivered us, ſome more, ſome leſs. Before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Veſpaſian, a Star in the form of a Sword appeared in the Heavens, directly over the City; after which there followed a ſlaughter like unto this of Epiphanes, though far greater. In the Cymbrian Wars, Pliny tells us that Armies were ſeen fighting in the Air from the Morning till the Evening.

Plin. lib. 2. c. 57.

In the time of Pope John the Eleventh, a Fountain poured out blood in ſtead of Water, in or near the City of Genoa; ſoon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great ſlaughter. Of theſe and the like Prodigious Signs, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one ſeemeth to me the moſt memorable, becauſe the moſt notorious. All Men know that in the Emperor Nero, the Off-ſpring of the Cæſars, as well natural as adopted, took end; whereof this notable Sign gave warning.

Mercur. Vipera de Prodig. lib. 8. Vipera de Priſco & ſacro inſtituto.

When Livia was firſt married to Auguſtus, an Eagle let fall into her Arms a white Hen, holding a Lawrel Branch in her Mouth. Livia cauſed this Hen to be carefully nouriſhed, and the Lawrel Branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a fair increaſe of white Poultrey, and from the little Branch there ſprang up in time a Grove of Lawrel: ſo that afterwards in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did uſe to carry in their Hands a Branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the Triumphs ended, to ſet it again in the ſame Ground: which Branches were obſerved, when they happened to wither, to foreſhew the death of thoſe Perſons who carried them in Triumph. And in the laſt year of Nero, all the Broods of the white Hen died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the Heads of all the Cæſars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Auguſtus his Hand, were ſtricken down with Lightning. That the Jews did not think ſuch ſtrange Signs to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling upon GOD, and praying, that theſe Tokens might turn to good.

Sueton. Galba.

Now, as the firſt Voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occaſioned by diſcord of the two Brethren therein reigning: ſo was his ſecond Expedition cauſed by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemy being left in Memphis, not ſtrong enough to force his Brother, who had defended Alexandria againſt all the Power of their Uncle; thought it the beſt way to ſeek entrance into that Royal City, rather by perſwaſion than by Arms. Phyſcon had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former Siege: the Alexandrians though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worſe to live in ſcarcity of Victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extream) ſince nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the Friends of the younger Brother ſaw no likelihood of good iſſue to be hoped for without reconciliation. Theſe good helps, and above all theſe, the loving diſpoſition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpoſe. But that which made him earneſtly deſirous to accompliſh it, was the fear wherein he ſtood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a ſtrong Garriſon in Peluſium: retaining that City which was the Key of Egypt, to his own uſe. This conſideration wrought alſo with Phyſcon, and with thoſe that were about him; ſo as by the vehement Mediation of Cleopatra their Siſter, the two Brethren made an end of all Quarrels.

When

When the News of this Accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithſtanding that he had pretended no other thing than the Eſtabliſhment of the King Philometor his Nephew, and a meaning to ſubject his younger Brother unto him, which he gave in anſwer to all Embaſſadors; yet he now prepared to make ſharp War upon them both. And to that end he preſently furniſhed and ſent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Army into Cæleſyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhinocorura, he met with Embaſſadors ſent from Ptolemy. Their Errand was partly to yield Thanks to Antiochus for the eſtabliſhing of Philometor in his Kingdom; partly to beſeech him, That he would rather be pleaſed to ſignifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which ſhould be performed, than to enter it as an Enemy with ſo puiſſant an Army. But Antiochus returned this ſhort anſwer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition, than that Ptolemy ſhould ſurrender into his hands, together with the City of Peluſium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that he ſhould alſo abandon and leave unto him the Iſle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them for ever. For anſwer unto theſe demands, he ſet down a day certain, and a ſhort one. Which being come and paſt, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recovered as well thoſe places which appertained to Ptolemy in Arabia, as in Egypt it ſelf; for Memphis and all about it received Antiochus, being unable to reſiſt him. The King having now no ſtop in his way to Alexandria; paſſed on thitherwards by eaſie Journeys.

Of all theſe troubles paſt, as well as of the preſent danger wherein Egypt ſtood; the Romans had notice long ago. But they found, or were contented to find, little reaſon for them to entermeddle therein. For it was a Civil War: and wherein Antiochus ſeemed to take part with the juſter cauſe. Yet they gave ſignification, that it would be much diſpleaſing unto them, to have the Kingdom of Egypt taken from the rightful Owners. More they could not, or would not do; being troubled with Perſeus; and therefore loth to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheleſs, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and ſtanding joyntly in need of help againſt their Uncle, who prepared and made open War againſt them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable Benefits, ſhould arm in defence of their Kingdom. Rome had been ſuſtained with Food from Egypt, in the War of Hannibal; when Italy lying waſte, had neither Corn, nor Money wherewith to buy ſufficient ſtore. By help of the Egyptian, had Aratus laid the Foundation of that greatneſs, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like help, had Rhodes been defended againſt Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were theſe Friendly Turns, which that Bountiful Houſe of the Ptolemies had done for ſundry People abroad, ill followed or ſeconded, by other as bad in requital: but with continuance of ſuteable Beneficence, from time to time encreaſed. Wherefore the two Brothers ſent abroad confidently for aid: eſpecially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who ſeemed moſt able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Phyſcon and Cleopatra had ſent, a year ſince: but their Embaſſadors lay ſtill in Rome. Of the Achæans they deſired in particular, that Lycortas the brave Warriour might be ſent to them as General of all the Auxiliaries, and his Son Polybius General of the Horſe. Hereunto the Achæans readily condeſcended: and would immediately have made performance; if Callicrates had not interpoſed his miſchievous Art. He, whether ſeeking occaſion to vaunt his obſequiouſneſs to the Romans; or much rather envying thoſe Noble Captains, whoſe Service the Kings deſired; withſtood the common Voice; which was, That their Nation ſhould not with ſuch ſmall numbers as were requeſted, but with all their power, be aiding unto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (he ſaid) convenient time to entangle themſelves in any ſuch buſineſs, as might make them the leſs able to yield unto the Romans what help ſoever ſhould be required in the Macedonian War. And in this Sentence, he with thoſe of his Faction obſtinately perſiſted; terrifying others with big Words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius the late Conſul had ſignified unto him, that the Romans were paſt all need of help: adding further, that a thouſand Foot, and two hundred Horſe, might well be ſpared, to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without diſabling their Nation to perform any Service to the Romans; for as much as the Achæans could, without trouble, raiſe thirty or forty thouſand Souldiers. All this notwithſtanding, the reſolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree ſhould have paſſed; he brought into the Theatre where the Aſſembly was held, a Meſſenger with Letters from Martius; whereby the Achæans were deſired to conform themſelves to the Roman Senate, and to labour as the Senate had done, by ſending Embaſſadors to ſet Egypt in Peace. This was an advice againſt all reaſon. For the Senate had indeed ſent Embaſſadors to make Peace; but as in a time of greater buſineſs elſewhere, with ſuch mild words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achæans ſhould do any good in the ſame kind. Yet Polybius and his Friends durſt not gainſay the Roman Council; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much diſtreſs; diſappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perſeus overcome: and then might the Embaſſador ſent from the Roman Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto thoſe Embaſſadors of Phyſcon and Cleopatra; which having ſtayed more than a whole year in the City, brought nothing of their buſineſs to effect until now. The Embaſſadours delivered their Meſſage in the Name of thoſe that had ſent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leſs than his Brother and Siſter.

In this Embaſſage of Ptolemy, now requeſting help from Rome; appeared a notable change of his Fortune, from ſuch as it had been before three or four years laſt paſt. For in the beginning of theſe his Troubles, which began with the Macedonian War; either he, or Eulæus and Lenæus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the Government of him, thought his Affairs in ſuch good Eſtate, that not only he determined to ſet upon Antiochus, for Cæleſyria, but would have interpoſed himſelf between the Romans and Perſeus, as a Competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that this Embaſſador was by

by a Friend perſwaded, to forget that Point of his Errand. From theſe high Thoughts, he fell on the ſudden, by the Rebellion of his Brother and Subjects, to live under protection of the ſame Antiochus. And now at ſuch time as by atonement with his Brother and Subjects, he might have ſeemed to ſtand in no need of ſuch protection; he hath remaining none other help whereby to ſave both his Kingdom and Life, than what can be obtained by their interceſſion which were employed againſt him. This miſerable condition of him, his Brother and Siſter, ſhewed it ſelf even in the Habit of thoſe Embaſſadors. They were poorly clad; the Hair of their Heads and Beards over-grown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their Hands Branches of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell grovelling and proſtrate upon the Floor. Their Garments were not ſo mean and mournful nor their Looks and Countenances ſo ſad and dejected, but that their Speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey ſtood; they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beſeeching them to have compaſſion of their Eſtate, and of their Princes, who had always remained Friendly and Faithful to the Romans. They ſaid that the People of Rome had ſo much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of ſuch Account and Authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleaſed but to ſend their Embaſſadors, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his Undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he preſently raiſe his Siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time or uſed any delay; then ſhould Ptolemy and Cleopatra be ſhortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with ſhameful diſhonour to the Senate and People thereof, in that, in the extream Dangers of all their Fortunes, they had not vouchſafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with Compaſſion, ſent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hoſtilius, as Embaſſadors, to determine and end the War betweeen thoſe Kings. In Commiſſion they had firſt to find King Ptolemy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both underſtand, that unleſs they ſurceaſed and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a Friend to the Senate and People of Rome, whom they found obſtinate or uſing delay. So theſe Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embaſſadors, took their leave, and went onward their way within three Days after.

Whilſt Popilius and his Fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had tranſported his Army over Lucine, ſome forty Miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his Journey, when the Roman Embaſſadors met him. After Greeting and Salutations at their firſt Encounter. Antiochus offered his Right Hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of Paper; willing him to read thoſe Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing elſe. Antiochus did ſo: and having a little while conſidered of the buſineſs, he told Popilius, That he would adviſe with his Friends, and then give the Embaſſadors their Anſwer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of Speech, which he had by Nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his Hand, willing him to make hm ſuch an Anſwer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King aſtoniſhed at this ſo rude and violent a Commandment, after he had ſtayed and pauſed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatſoever the Senate ſhall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his Hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt without any good Iſſue of his Coſtly Expedition; even in ſuch a manner as * Daniel had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular Circumſtance, both of returning, and of doing miſchief to Jeruſalem after his return; like as if theſe things had rather been hiſtorified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embaſſadors, they ſtayed a while, and ſettled the Kingdom of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder Brother, and appointing the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptian, having firſt ſent away Antiochus's Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian Ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their Demeanour towards Eumenes, Pruſias, Maſaniſſa, and Cotys. The end of Perſeus and his Children. The Inſtability of Kingly Eſtates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Concluſion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Meſſage, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were gown, through their Conqueſt of Macedon. The ſame Popilius had been well contented, a year before this, to lay aſide the roughneſs of his natural Condition, and to give good Language to the Achæans and Ætolians, when he went Embaſſador to thoſe People of Greece, that were of far leſs power than the King Antiochus. Likewiſe, Antiochus had with good Words, and no more than good Words, diſmiſſed other Embaſſadors which came from Rome, in ſuch ſort, as they complained not, much leſs uſed any menacing Terms, though he performed nothing of their Requeſt. But now the Caſe was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes ſent to Rome his Brother Attalus to gratulate the Victory over Perſeus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate againſt the Gallo-Greeks, which moleſted him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by moſt of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and requeſt of the Senate his Brothers Kingdom for himſelf; for it ſhould ſurely be given him. Theſe hopeful promiſes tickled Attalus with ſuch Ambition, that he either approved, or ſeemed to approve the motion. But his honeſt nature was ſoon reclaimed by the faithful Counſel of Stratius a Phyſician; whom Eumenes had ſent to Rome of purpoſe to keep his Brother upright. So when he came into the Senate, he delivered the Errand about which he had been ſent; recounted his own ſervices done to the Romans in the late War, * wherewithal he forgat not to make of his Brother as good mention as he could: and finally requeſted, That the Towns of Ænus and Maronea might be beſtowed upon himſelf. * By his omitting to ſue for his Brothers Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of Audience for that buſineſs alone.

Where-

Wherefore, to make him underſtand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his deſire; but in the Preſents which they gave to him (as was their cuſtom to Embaſſadors that came with an acceptable Meſſage) they uſed ſingular Mag-
Polyb. ibid. nificence. Nevertheleſs, Attalus took no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did ſo highly diſpleaſe the Senate, that whilſt he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Ænus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectual their promiſe; which otherwiſe they could not, without ſhame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Pergamus; they ſent Embaſſadors to them, with ſuch inſtructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpoſe. The diſpleaſure of the Senate being ſo manifeſt; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another Voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his ſecond Voyage thither, for this neceſſity of the third: ſince, by his malice to Perſeus, he had layed open unto theſe ambitious Potentates the way to his own Doors. No ſooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to ſend him going. It was not thought expedient to uſe him as an Enemy, that came to viſit them in love: neither could they, in ſo doing, have avoided the note of ſingular inconſtancy: and to entertain him as a Friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King ſhould be ſuffered to come to Rome; and by Vertue thereof ſent him home, without expence of much further Complement.

Pruſias King of Bithynia had been at Rome ſomewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better faſhion. He had learned to behave himſelf as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or deſire. For entring into the Senate, he lay down, and kiſſed the Threſhold, calling the Fathers his Gods and Saviours: as alſo he uſed to wear a Cap, after the manner of Slaves newly Manumiſed, profeſſing himſelf an enfranchiſed Bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeed naturally a Slave, and one that by ſuch abject Flattery kept himſelf ſafe; though doing otherwiſe greater miſchief than any wherewith Perſeus had been charged. His Errand was, beſides matter of Complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his Son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive Education. Further petition he made, to have ſome Towns added to his Kingdom: whereto, becauſe the Grant would have been unjuſt, he received a cold anſwer. But concerning the Wardſhip of his Son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleaſure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to conſider, what effectual protection the Romans gave unto the Children of Kings, that were to their Patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Maſaniſſa held his Credit with the Romans good. His Quarrels were endleſs with the Carthaginians: which made the Friendſhip of the Romans to him the more aſſured. In all Controverſies they gave judgment on his ſide: and whereas he had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at firſt they could find no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppreſſion) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due ſo long. Now indeed had Rome good leiſure to deviſe upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the Race of Maſaniſſa himſelf was ſhortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He ſent to Rome one of his Sons, to congratulate the Victory over Perſeus; and offered to come thither himſelf, there to ſacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good Will was lovingly accepted; His Son rewarded; and he entreated to ſtay at home.

Cotys the Thracian ſent Embaſſadors, to excuſe himſelf touching the Aid by him given to Perſeus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by Hoſtages; and to entreat, That his Son which was taken with the Children of Perſeus, might be ſet at liberty for convenient Ranſom. His Excuſe was not taken; ſince he had voluntarily obliged himſelf to Perſeus, by giving Hoſtages without neceſſity: Yet was his Son given back to him Ranſom-free; with admonition, to carry himſelf better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdom lay between Macedon and ſome barbarous Nations; in which reſpect, it was good to hold him in fair Terms

As for thoſe unhappy Kings, Perſeus and Gentius they were led through Rome, with their Children and Friends, in the Triumphs of Æmylius and Anicius. Perſeus had often made ſuit to Æmylius, that he might not be put to ſuch diſgrace: but he ſtill received one ſcornful anſwer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himſelf. And ſurely, had he not hoped for greater Mercy than he found, he would rather have ſought his death in Macedon, than have been beholding to the Courteſie of his inſolent Enemies for a wretched life. The iſſue of the Roman Clemency, whereof Æmylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his Fellow King, had been led in Chains through the Streets, before the Chariots of their Triumphing Victors, they were committed to Priſon, wherein they remained without hope of releaſe. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do Sacrifice, he ſhould command the Captives to be had away to Priſon, and there put to death: ſo as the Honour of the Vanquiſher, and Miſery of thoſe that were overcome, might be both together at the utmoſt. This laſt Sentence of Death was remitted unto Perſeus: yet ſo, that he had little joy of his Life; but either famiſhed himſelf, or (for it is diverſly reported) was kept watching perforce by thoſe that had him in Cuſtody; and ſo died for want of Sleep. Of his Sons, two died; it is uncertain how. The youngeſt called Alexander (only in name like unthe Great, though deſtined ſometimes perhaps by his Father, unto the Fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner, or at his beſt Preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In ſuch Poverty ended the Royal Houſe of Macedon: and it ended on the ſudden; though ſome eightſcore years after the death of that Monarch, unto whoſe Ambition this whole Earth ſeemed too narrow.

If Perſeus had known it before, that his own Son, ſhould one day be compelled to earn his Living by Handy-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonneſs of Sovereignty, have commanded thoſe poor Men to be ſlain, which had recovered his Treaſures out of the Sea, by their skill in the feat of Diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest Oppressors, and the most untrodden Wretches are all subject unto One High Power, governing all alike with absolute Command. But such is our unhappiness; instead of that Blessed Counsel, Do as ye would be done unto; a Sentence teaching all Moderation, and pointing out the way to Felicity; we entertain that arrogant Thought, I will be like to the most High: that is I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly:

Juvenal. Sat. 10.

—∪∪— Et qui volunt occidere quenquam.
Posse volunt ———

Even they that have no murd'rous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vain desire of ability to do evil without controul: which is a dangerous Temptation unto the performance. GOD, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their own hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Sovereign Authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own Person) some one of his own Sons or Nephews to root up all his Progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their Brotherhood, or other nearness in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot, that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole House, yet reigning over all? The untimely death of many Princes, which could not humble themselves to such Flattery; and the common practise of the Turkish Emperors, to murder all their Brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofs hereof. Hereto may be added, That the Heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second, was, by reason of a Marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, Heir Apparent to the Crown of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the Race of his Mortal Enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such Examples of the instability whereto all Mortal Affairs are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitory Gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked Precedents, the Evil that may fall on their own Posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That

* The true Law of free Monarchies.

* GOD is the surest and sharpest Schoolmaster, that can be devised, for such Kings, as think this world ordained for them, without controulment to turn it upside-down at their pleasure. ———

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus; it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own Person, that was led along therein, as part of his own Spoils; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth, until the Civil Wars which followed upon the death of Julius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this Noble Triumph likely to have been hindered by the Souldiers; who grudged at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe Exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much Honour of his Victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased GOD to take away from him his two remaining Sons, that were not given in Adoption: of which, the one died five days before the Triumph; the other, three Days after it. This loss he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity; since the joy of his Victory was requited with his own private Calamity, instead of the publick.

Chap. 3. §. 4.

About the same time, Octavius the Admiral, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius Prisoner: made their several Triumphs. The Glory of which Magnificent Spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings either visiting the Imperial City, or offering to visit her, and do their Duties in Person; were enough to say unto Rome, Sume superbiam; Take upon thee the Majesty, that thy Deserts have purchased.

BY this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the World; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the Field; having rooted up or cut down, all that kept it from the Eyes and Admiration of the World. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the Beauty it had; the storms of Ambition shall beat her great Boughs and Branches one against another; her Leaves shall fall off; her Limbs wither, and a Rabble of Barbarous Nations enter the Field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and Conquering Nations, have been the Subject of those Ancient Histories, which have been preserved, and yet remain among us; and withal of so many Tragical Poets as in the Persons of powerful Princes, and other Mighty Men have complained against Infidelity, Time, Destiny; and most of all against the Variable Success of Worldly things, and Instability of Fortune. To these Undertakings, the greatest Lords of the World have been stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Air, and soweth in the Wind; than by the affection of bearing Rule, which draweth after it so much Vexation, and so many Cares. And that this is true, the good Advice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the Living, so is it to the Dead of no use at all; because separate from Knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extream ill Bargain of buying this lasting Discourse, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stoln out of the World without noise; than to be put in mind, that they have purchased the report of their Actions in the World, by Rapine, Oppression and Cruelty, by giving in Spoil the Innocent and Labouring Soul to the Idle and Insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the World of their Ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of Sorrows.

Since

Since the fall of the Roman Empire, (omitting that of the Germans, which had neither greatneſs nor continuance) there hath been no State fearful in the Eaſt, but that of the Turk; nor in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpred his Wings far over his Neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moors out of Granado, have made many Attempts to make themſelves Maſters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the Treaſures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they poſſeſs in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerful. But as the Turk is now counterpoiſed by the Perſian, ſo inſtead of ſo many Millions as have been ſpent by the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a Defenſive War, and in Diverſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand Pound, continued but for two years or three at the moſt, they may not only be perſwaded to live in Peace, but all their ſwelling and overflowing Streams may be brought back into their natural Channels and old Banks. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent and to be regarded; the one ſeeking to root out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the Truth and Sincere Profeſſion there of; the one to joyn all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spain.

For the reſt, if we ſeek a reaſon of the Succeſſion and continuance of this boundleſs Ambition in Mortal Men, we may add to that which hath been already ſaid; That the Kings and Princes of the World have always laid before them, the Actions, but not the Ends, of thoſe great Ones which præceded them. They are always tranſported with the Glory of the one, but they never mind the Miſery of the other, till they find the Experience in themſelves. They neglect the Advice of GOD, while they enjoy Life, or hope it; but they follow the Counſel of Death, upon his firſt approach. It is he that puts into Man all the Wiſdom of the World, without ſpeaking a Word; which GOD with all the Words of his Law, Promiſes or Threats, doth not infuſe. Death, which hateth and deſtroyeth Man, is believed; GOD, which hath made him and loves him is always deferred. I have conſidered (ſaith Solomon) all the Works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of Spirit: but who believes it, till Death tells it us. It was Death, which opening the Conſcience of Charles the Fifth, made him enjoyn his Son Philip to reſtore Navarre; and King Francis the Firſt of France, to command that Juſtice ſhould be done upon the Murderers of the Proteſtants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone, that can ſuddenly make Man to know himſelf. He tells the Proud and Inſolent, that they are but Abjects, and humbles them at the inſtant; makes them crie, complain, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepaſſed Happineſs. He takes the account of the Rich, and proves him a Begger; a naked Begger, which hath intereſt in nothing, but in the Gravel that fills his Mouth. He holds a Glaſs before the Eyes of the moſt Beautiful, and makes them ſee therein, their Deformity and Rottenneſs; and they acknowledge it.

O Eloquent, Juſt and Mighty Death! whom none could adviſe, thou haſt perſwaded; what none hath dared, thou haſt done; and whom all the World hath flattered, thou only haſt caſt out of the World and deſpiſed: thou haſt drawn together all the far ſtretched Greatneſs, all the Pride, Cruelty, and Ambition of Man, and covered it all over with theſe two narrow Words, Hîc jacet.

Laſtly, Whereas this Book, by the Title it hath, calls it ſelf, The Firſt Part of the General Hiſtory of the World, implying a Second, and Third Volume; which I alſo intended, and have hewn out; beſides many other Diſcouragements, perſwading my Silence; it hath pleaſed GOD to take that Glorious Prince out of the World, to whom they were directed; whoſe unſpeakable and never enough lamented loſs, hath taught me to ſay with Job, Verſa eſt in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

To the READER.

THE Use of Chronological Tables is needful to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annals, yearly set down all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serve as an Index to the present Part of this Work; pointing unto the several Matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far disjoyned in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither do I think, that any can be. For howsoever the years of the first Patriarchs may seem to have been well-near compleat, yet in the Reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we find many Fractions, and the last year, or years, of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diverse and imperfect forms of the year, which were in use among sundry Nations: causing * the Summer Months, in process of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extream confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing Computations, as have already gotten Authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alledged, in excuse of such Error as a more intentive and perfect Calculator shall happen to find herein. It may serve to free the Book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgment) from any notorious Anachronicism; which ought to suffice. The Book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only for some Errors of the Press, in the numbring of years, but for some hasty mis-reckonings of mine own; which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want careful diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall find reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

* See Lib. 2. Chap. 3. §. 6.

The Titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them; as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles, or more, are over the Head, as | Rome / Nabonassar | there do the Numbers underneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For Example: The Walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319 year from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jehoshaphat began his Reign in the 3774 of the Julian Æra, in the 3092 of the World, and in the 99 year of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forborn to insert those years, which I find not signed with some regardable Accident: as with the Birth or Death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reign; some change of Government; some Battel fought; or the like. So, of the 13 years wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the first; that is, omitting all between the 4 of Jehoshaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17, wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram first reigned with Jehoshaphat his Father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a Page with 12 Lines of idle Cyphers; numbring forth 2, 3, 4, 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and 17 of Jehoshaphat. In setting down the Kings, there is noted over the Head of every one, what Place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in rank, of those that reigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption: Before the Name is the first year of his Reign; at the end, or foot of the Name, (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath are those years of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the year of any remarkable Accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings Name, there is it to be understood, that the same year belonged, not only to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more, of his fore-goers: as the first Year of Jehoram King of Israel was the same with the second of his Brother Ahazia, and the 22 of his Father Ahab. So, where two or three names are found in one space; as in the 3077 Year of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri: it is meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same Year; which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the Years of the Ægyptian Kings are set down the Years of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwhiles, the Day of the Month upon which Nabonassar's Year began: which, how it varied from other Years, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or account of Years, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the Book it self: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads is set down first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the Year of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his Reign in Persia, in the 55 Olympiad, and the first Year thereof.

Now, for that the Years of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one Month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to express their several beginnings, some painful Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their several Columns; opposing part of the one Year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one strait Line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more troublesome than useful; since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needful to observe, that howsoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24 Years elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of Nabonassar, yet the Reign of some King may have begun at such a time of the Year as did not suit with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example may explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her Reign the 17 of November, in the Year of our Lord 1558: She was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it up; threw down Images; and reformed many things in Religion; all in her first Year: yet not all in that Year 1558, but the greater part in the Year following; whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25 of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is never of a whole Year.

The Julian Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the Years of the World, was devised by that honourable and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian Years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980 Years; which result from the multiplication of 19, 28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the Years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present Year; or if no Fraction remain, it shews the last Year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498 of this Period, when was fought the great Battel of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun 18, and consequently the Dominical Letter F, as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498, by 19 for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the present account, always exceeds the Years of the World by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a Year, than any other Æra (as From the beginning of the World, from the Flood, from Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in Works of this kind: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
